VIII. CUSTODY AND MANAGEMENT OF ESTATE

[§ 463] A. In General—1. Fundamental Rule. An executor or administrator occupies a position of the highest trust and confidence [89] and is required to use reasonable diligence and act in entire good faith in performing the duties of his trust.[90] He is not a guarantor or insurer of the safety of the estate, nor is he expected to be infallible,[91] but the prudence, care, and judgment which one of fair average capacity and ability exercises in the transaction of his own business or, as sometimes stated, the prudence, care, and judgment of fiduciaries ordinarily capable under like circumstances furnish the standard by which his conduct is to be judged.[92] The acts of the representative must be judged ac-

"The duties of an executor or administrator are active, and not passive. He cannot be permitted to neglect to do those things which are plainly required at his hands by law or the order of the court, and, when complaint is made of such neglect, excuse himself by alleging that such delay or omission was for the benefit of the estate." administrators should keep separate books of accounts of the estate,[2] and if they fail to keep their accounts properly they will be held to a strict liability.[3]

[§ 467] 5. Deposits. It is proper for the executor or administrator, for the purpose of safely keeping the funds of the estate during administration, to deposit the same in a bank,[4] and indeed under some statutes the representative is required[5] or the court is empowered to order him[6] to do so. If the funds are so deposited and due care is used in selecting the depositary, the representative is not necessarily responsible for a loss resulting from the subsequent failure of the bank,[7] the test being whether he has exercised such care as men of common prudence ordinarily exercise in their own affairs;[8] but he is liable where the bank was reputed of doubtful solvency, and by the exercise of

[c] Estoppel.—The fact that one of the distributees agreed to the appointment of the administrator, and was to receive a part of the administrator's commission for special services rendered by him, does not estop him from questioning the act of the administrator in selecting a bank in which to deposit the funds of the estate, where he had no knowledge of or control over deposits. Germania Safety Vault, etc., Co. v. Driskill, 66 SW 610, 23 KyL 2050.

[d] Effect of settlement in court.—The fact that an ex parte settlement made by the administrator with the county court included as a part of the administrator's receipts the amount the estate had on deposit when the bank closed, as evidenced by a certificate of the receiver of the bank, does not preclude the distributees from claiming from the administrator any balance resulting from the loss of the deposit, after reasonable diligence the personal representative might have known it.[9] The representative should make the deposit with a designation of his fiduciary capacity,[10] and if the deposit is made in his individual name, without any designation of the trust, he is liable for any loss which results from such disposition of the funds,[11] regardless of any question of negligence or intention in making the deposit in such form,[12] and it is not material that he had at the time no money of his own deposited in the bank,[13] or that he informed the bank, at the time of the deposit, that the funds belonged to the estate.[14] There are circumstances under which deposits may be needlessly made or be left too long for a prudent course of administration; and in such a case, or where the representative lends for a fixed time to a bank, instead of making a deposit subject to withdrawal at pleasure or lending as payable on demand, he may incur liability for loss in case of the bank's failure.[15] So also if an executor or administrator deposits money of the estate in a bank and allows it to remain on deposit after the time when it should have been distributed, and the money is lost by the failure of the bank, he is liable for the loss.[16]

The consent of the beneficiaries to a deposit will relieve the personal representative from liability to them for a loss resulting therefrom.[17]

[§ 468] 6. Disposing of Property.[18] The personal representative can dispose of personal property belonging to the estate, being responsible for the faithful execution of the trust.[19]

[§ 469] 7. Liability for Assets Received. A personal representative is of course liable and accrediting dividends received, where it does not appear that the certificate was ever accepted otherwise than as a memorandum entitling the holder to dividends in the distribution of the assets of the bank. [a] Administrator as officer of bank.—An administrator was liable where funds of the estate were lost by the failure of the bank in which he deposited them, where he was an officer of the bank and had the active management of it, and knew when he made the deposit that the bank must eventually fail. Matter of Scudder, 21 Misc. 179, 47 NYS 101.

[b] Trust company as administrator.—While it was the duty of a trust company acting as administrator to deposit the funds of the estate in a bank, it was guilty of negligence in depositing them in an insolvent bank, and therefore liable for loss resulting therefrom, where its president had actual knowledge at the time of the insolvent condition of the bank, and its officers whose duty it was to look after deposits of trust accounts had heard rumors sufficient to put them on inquiry, which if made would have revealed to them the true condition of the bank. And in view of these facts the fact that the clerk of the trust company having immediate charge of the deposits acted in good faith, believing the bank to be solvent, did not exonerate the company; nor was the trust company authorized to rely on the general reputation of the bank, where its president was also president of the bank, and thus had the means at hand, coupled with the duty, to acquaint himself with its condition. Williamson v. Morton, 2 Md. Ch. 94.

countable to the estate for all assets which have come into his hands,[20] and where there are two executors one who has received debts due to the estate cannot discharge himself from liability to the estate by a payment of the sums received to his coexecutor.[21] An executor has been held authorized, upon the verbal order of the county judge, to pay over to him any moneys in his hands belonging to the estate or legatees thereof, after which the judge will be liable on his bond for the proper disbursement thereof, such payment discharging the executor from all further liability for the moneys so paid over.[22]

[§ 470] 8. Persons Acting in Different Capacities. One who is executor or administrator may also act in another capacity concerning the estate, in which case the due sequence of the trusts varies with his present status.[23] Thus if an executor is also a devisee or residuary legatee, or an administrator is next of kin to the decedent, and he enters generally into possession of the property, he is usually held to do so in his representative capacity.[24] If one is executor or administrator and also guardian of a beneficiary he holds the estate first of all as executor or administrator, and does not hold anything as guardian which is not separated from the assets of the estate or placed properly to his account as guardian.[25] So too if an executor is also the designated trustee under a will he comes into possession as executor, and his election afterward to hold as trustee must be manifested by some plain and unequivocal act.[26] Of course, when the functions of the executor or administrator as such have ceased, he holds whatever balance there may be in his hands in his other capacity, whether as trustee, guardian, legatee, distributee, or otherwise.[27] In case of the representative's misappropriation or default the loss should be sustained in what was then his true character.[28]

"The general rule governing the survival of contractual obligations as against the personal representative and the estates of deceased persons is stated in 2 Parson's Contr. (9th Ed.) 685, as follows: 'It is a presumption of law that parties to a simple contract intended to bind not only themselves, but their personal representatives; and such parties may sue on a contract, although not named therein. Hence, as we have seen, executors, though not named in a contract, are liable, so far as they have assets, for the breach of a contract which was broken in the lifetime of their testator. And, if the contract was not broken in his lifetime, they must not break it, but will be held to its performance, unless this presumption is overcome by the nature of the contract, as where the things to be done required the personal skill of the testator himself.' 18 Cyc. 239. This rule is elementary. The difficulty in applying it arises when the facts of the particular case are such as to render it doubtful as to whether or not the thing to be done requires the personal skill of the deceased himself. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Billing's Appeal, 106 Pa. 558, 560, said: 'Where a party agrees to do that which does not necessarily require him to perform in person, that which he may, by assignment of his contract or otherwise, employ others to do, we may fairly infer, unless otherwise expressed, that a mere personal relation was not contemplated. It is true also, perhaps, that a contract may involve matters of such a nature as to render the performance of them so incompatible with the settlement of a decedent's estate, and so inconsistent with the general duties of an administrator or executor that, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, the parties may be presumed, as in the case of Dickinson v. Calahan, 19 Pa. 227, to have intended its dissolution at death. The whole question in such case is one for construction, and depends upon the intention of the parties, that intention to be found under the rules regulating the construction of contracts in general.'" Macdonald v. O'Shea, supra.

[a] An executor need not wait to be sued before performing the testator's obligations. He may act voluntarily, and where he does so in good faith, and with reasonable care and prudence, he incurs no liability. Denton v. Sanford, 103 N. Y. 607, 9 NE 490.

[b] Contracts for repairs or improvements.—(1) A contract made by decedent during his lifetime for the making of repairs and improvements on his real estate binds his personal representative (Burton's Est., 16 Pa. Co. 246; Halyburton v. Kershaw, 3 S. C. Eq. 105), (2) even though nothing has been done during the decedent's liftime (Pringle v. McPherson, 2 S. C. Eq. 524). (3) But special facts and circumstances will be considered as justifying a discontinuance of such work, where enforcement of specific performance is sought against the executor or administrator and the estate is injuriously affected (Gray v. Hawkins, 8 Oh. St. 449, 72 AmD 600), or (4) where other arrangements manifestly beneficial to the estate are made (Moore v. O'Brannin, 14 Oh. St. 177). (5) The representative cannot bind the estate regardless of its interests by a new contract for completing a building, the erection of which the deceased had contracted for. Chicago Lumber Co. v. Tomlinson, 54 Kan. 770, 39 P 694.

[c] Building contracts (1) made by a decedent in his lifetime are binding on and may be completed by his personal representative. Janin v. Browne, 59 Cal. 37; Kadish v. Lyons, 229 Ill. 35, 82 NE 194; Exchange Nat. Bank v. Betts, 103 Kan. 807, 179 P 660; Bambrick v. Webster Groves Presb. Church Assoc., 53 Mo. A. 225; Russell v. Buckhout, 87 Hun 46, 34 NYS 271; Riblet v. Wallis, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 360; In re Allam, 199 Pa. 573, 49 A 252; Pringle v. McPherson, 2 S. C. Eq. 524; In re Day [1898] 2 Ch. 510; Cooper v. Jarman, L. R. 3 Eq. 98, 2 ERC 243; Quick v. Ludborrow, 3 Bulstr. 29, 81 Reprint 25. (2) The liabilities of the original contract attach to the work done by administrators in completing it so as to render money due under it subject to the claim of a subcontractor for work done for the intestate. Reicke v. Saunders, 3 Mo. A. 566; Horton v Carlisle, 2 Disn. 184, 13 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 113. (3) An executor does not bind the estate for the price of materials purchased to complete an unfinished contract of the testator, if he used such materials in his (the executor's) own business. Oram's Est., 9 Phila. (Pa.) 358. (4) "Judge Woerner in his American Law of Administration (2d Ed.) § 328, says: 'If one agrees to build a house before a given time, and dies before that time, his executors are bound to perform the contract; and the completion by an administrator of a decedent's contract to build a house attaches to his work all the liabilities of the original contract, so that a subcontractor is entitled to his lien for materials furnished the intestate.' See also, 3 Williams on Executors (7th Am. Ed.) 224. Both of these eminent textwriters cite in support of their text among other authorities the early English case of Quick v. Ludburrow, reported in 3 Bulstrode's Reports, 30, in the year 1865, in which Coke, Chief Justice, said: 'If a man be bound to build a house for another before such a time, and he which he bound dies before the time, his executors are bound to perform this.'" MacDonald v. O'Shea, 58 Wash. 169, 173, 108 P 436, AnnCas1912A 417.

[d] Contracts for services.—An administrator may retain an employee hired by the decedent, where the services of the employee are necessary for the protection of the estate. In re Miner, 46 Cal. 564.

[e] Redemption of pledge.—Where one to whom shares of stock were given for life only pledges them as security for his debt, his property is rightly used by his executor in payment of the debt and releasing the stock. In re Orne, 192 Pa. 626, 44 A 287.

[f] A grant of an exclusive right to use a patent for a term of years which required the grantee to pay a stipulated royalty and contained a covenant by him that the royalty would amount to a certain sum per year, but did not provide for his personal services in using the patented process, the obligation to pay royalty did not terminate at the death of the grantee, but was enforceable against his estate. Empire Pav., etc., Co. v. Prather, 58 Mo. A. 487.

[g] Order expiring with death of testator.—An order given by a testator for the delivery of certificates to a third person expires with the death of the testator. McKee v. Myers, Add. (Pa.) 31.

[h] Entire contract binding.—Where, after the death of the pur-by the decedent is of the essence;[31] or such as are terminated by decedent's death,[32] even though performance is detrimental to the estate;[33] and where the personal representative neglects or refuses to carry out the contract of his decedent, the other party has the usual remedies, as in electing to treat it as rescinded and claiming damages.[34] Conversely, the executor or administrator has the right to carry out the contracts of his decedent,[35] even though they are of a personal nature,[36] and enforce the fulfillment of obligations to his decedent where likely to prove beneficial to the estate.[37] If a con-chaser of certain timber, his administrator and heirs continued to perform the contract by cutting and manufacturing the timber at a large profit, they were equally bound to perform a condition of the contract requiring the purchaser to pay taxes assessed on the land pending performance of the contract. Michigan Iron, etc., Co. v. Nester, 147 Mich. 599, 111 NW 177.

[i] Order of court not necessary.—An administrator may perform a contract of his intestate for the estate's benefit without an order therefor from the county court, where the contract is not of a strictly personal nature, assuming the risk of being required to make good any loss that may ensue, and if he acts in good faith without such order to comply with intestate's contract his acts as to the other party to the contract are binding upon the estate. Kadish v. Lyon, 229 Ill. 35, 82 NE 194.

[j] Assent to contract.—Where testator employed plaintiffs to defend his brother, and testator's executors notified plaintiff that no liability for further outlay would be recognized unless specifically authorized, but plaintiff asserted his intention to proceed under the contract and was told that the agreement would be performed, this was an assent to conform to its terms. Barrett v. Towne, 196 Mass. 487, 82 NE 698, 13 LRANS 643.

[k] Contractual right to settle dissolved partnership.—A contractual right and duty of one of the members of a dissolved partnership to collect outstanding assets and distribute the proceeds in a certain way passes on his death to his representative. McDowell v. North, 24 Ind. A. 435, 55 NE 789.

[l] A covenant running with the land conveyed gives no remedy for a breach against the personal representative of the vendor. Carr v. Lowry, 27 Pa. 257; Bland v. Umstead, 23 Pa. 316.

[m] Right to terminate contract.—If an administrator continues a contract of employment of his decedent under the mistaken belief that it is binding after the death of one of the parties to it, he has a right to terminate it without liability thereafter. [c] Completing work of public official.—Where, upon the formation of a new county, the probate clerk partially completed the transcript of the property records of the old county for use of the new county, pursuant to a statute, making it the duty of the probate clerk of the old county to transcribe the records pertaining to real or personal property transferred to the new county, and providing that he shall be paid therefor at the rate allowed by law for making copies of such records, but died before the work was completed, his administrator cannot recover on behalf of his estate for work done by such administrator in connection with such transcripts after the death of the clerk. It was held that the neglect of testator to make such a codicil, and the assertion by the first party's executor and beneficiaries under the will of the right to have the estate administered, irrespective of the contract, amounted to a breach thereof, subjecting the executors to an action for damages. [a] An ordinary building contract, near completion and not at that stage calling for services personal to the contractor, does not abate by his death, and his executor, even before the issue of letters, has the power to complete it and so realize for the estate the money to become due on its completion, and save it the penalty which would otherwise accrue on the bond. Bambrick v. Webster Groves Presb. Church Assoc., 53 Mo. A. 225.

[b] Approval of court.—Where the executor or administrator proposes performing some executory contract made by his decedent on which the representative was not necessarily bound, or where in some onerous or difficult obligation of the decedent which bound the estate some practical adjustment becomes available which it is desirable to carry out, the approval or direction of the court may be properly sought in advance; and under some statutes this course must be taken by a representative who would avoid a personal responsibility in the transaction. Jessup v. Jessup, 102 Ill. 480; Gray v. Hawkins, 8 Oh. St. 449, 72 AmD 600.

[c] When performance improper.—An executory contract of decedent should not be performed where the performance will result in giving some of the creditors of the decedent's estate an advantage over others. Jessup v. Jessup, 102 Ill. 480.

36. Mecartney v. Carbine, 108 Ill. A. 282 (where a contract made prior to decedent's death is of a personal nature, the administrator may be directed by the probate court to perform it, or he may on his own responsibility and risk undertake to do so for the benefit of the estate).

[a] The personal representative may ratify a contract of his decedent made during infancy, although the death occurred before the decedent reached majority. Jefford v. Ringgold, 6 Ala. 544.

[b] Failure to renew lease.—The executors are not chargeable with tract of decedent carries with it an option to accept or reject, the exercise of such option passes properly to the personal representative,[38] but the representative is not empowered to make anew or enlarge a contract for his decedent, to ratify his void transactions, or to waive defenses to which he is entitled by law.[39] The personal representative may avoid his decedent's contract or covenant on the usual grounds of incapacity or fraud,[40] or suspend performance where the other party is bound to proceed first;[41] and in some instances an executory contract inequitable in its consequences to the estate may be avoided or compromised,[42] or an onerous obligation may by its own terms admit sometimes of a legal or equitable rescission to which the personal representative is a party.[43]

As between the representative and the beneficiaries of the estate the former may in his discretion, as a general rule, perform or rescind any personal contract of decedent as may be for the best interests of the estate,[44] unless the matter is regulated by statute.[45]

Where the personal representative performs the contract or covenant of his decedent and completes the transaction, the estate will be held bound for any loss sustained thereby, and will be entitled to any profit realized in consequence.[46]

[§ 473] C. Exoneration of Estate from Liability. An executor or administrator may take steps to exonerate the estate from a liability to which it might otherwise be subject.[47]

[§ 474] D. Engaging in Business—1. General Rule. The general rule is that an executor or administrator is not justified in placing or leaving assets in trade, for this is a hazardous use to permit of trust moneys and trading lies outside the scope of administrative functions.[48] This is true, even though the property is of such a character loss from a failure to renew a lease of the testator, where the latter had during his lifetime failed to perform certain covenants of the lease in consequence of which the lessor was not bound to renew. Fisher v. Fisher, 1 Bradf. Surr. (N. Y.) 335.

[b] Election to declare contract forfeited.—Where the administratrix of the vendor in a contract for the sale of land elects, on default of the purchaser, to declare the contract forfeited, and the purchaser acquiesces in her election, her act is binding on the estate and a subsequent administrator cannot revoke it except for fraud. [a] The contracts of infants (1) are generally binding on their personal representatives to the same extent that the infants themselves were bound, and the personal representative may affirm or disaffirm such a contract as the interest of the estate may require. Bedford v. Clay, 3 Dana (Ky.) 226. (2) But the right of an administrator to disaffirm, on the ground of infancy, contracts made by his intestate is coextensive with, but no greater than, the right which the intestate would have if living. Hangen v. Hachmeister, 49 N. Y. Super. 34, 16 NYWklyDig 552. (3) Accordingly, where decedent, after reaching majority, has affirmed a contract made by him during infancy, it is binding on his executor or administrator. Ferguson v. Bell, 17 Mo. 347. that it can be used to better advantage in that way.[49] So great a breach of trust is it for the representative to engage in business with the funds of the estate that the law charges him with all the losses thereby incurred without on the other hand allowing him to receive the benefit of any profits which he may make, the rule being that the persons beneficially interested in the estate may either hold the representative liable for the amount so used with interest, or at their election take all the profits which the representative has made by such unauthorized use of the funds of the estate.[50] And this rule has been carried out to the extent of holding executors who carried on the business of testator, and, without an order of court, sold goods on time without security, responsible for a loss therefrom, although the total profits from their sales exceeded the losses on such unsecured debts.[51] Beneficiaries under a will are also entitled to offset their claim to a fair rental value of premises connected with a business continued by the executor without authority against payments made by him for the benefit of the estate by continuing the business.[52]

The accountability of the representative with respect to profits extends only to the actual net profits made during the period in which he carried on the business,[53] and it has been held that in esti-

[f] Extent of liability under special circumstances.—Complainant, the oldest of nine children, was under age at his father's death. He conducted his father's business, that of an undertaker, for the benefit of the family. After he attained his majority, his mother who was sole acting executrix agreed with him that the profits of the business remaining after the support and maintenance of herself and the infant children should belong to the complainant in payment for his services. When the mother died in 1900 complainant was made administrator de bonis non of his father's estate. The youngest child was then eight years old. The complainant continued to support the minor children. It was held that he was not chargeable as administrator with the profits of the business during the minority of his brothers and sisters, and that the business became his at the termination of that period from the necessity of the case, especially in view of the statute prohibiting the conduct of the business of undertaking by any unlicensed person, but that he was chargeable with the value of the tangible assets of the estate used in the business. [a] Expenses paid by the representative for salaries, etc., cannot be reviewed by the surrogate on an ac-

mating the net profits only profits resulting from the employment of testator's estate should be considered, making allowance for the business skill and credit of the executor in conducting the business.[54] But as the representative cannot deal with the property to his own advantage, he is not entitled to a salary for his own services to be deducted from the gross receipts.[55]

Speculative accounts of the decedent should be settled by the personal representative in a reasonable time,[56] and the latter is not excused from liability by the fact that he acted in good faith and with ordinary prudence in carrying the account.[57]

[§ 475] 2. Limitations of Rule—a. In General. Good discretion may require some latitude in closing out decedent's business, and this a probate court will duly consider when passing upon the representative's accounts,[58] and statutes are sometimes found authorizing an executor or administrator to carry on the business if it is not necessary that it should be sold at once for the payment of debts.[59] Thus the personal representative may be justified in continuing the business so far as is necessary for the purpose of winding up the same and converting the assets into money[60] or carrying out existing contracts of decedent.[61] So also in agricultural states a temporary management of a plantation by the personal representative of the deceased owner, under judicial supervision for the benefit of all concerned, is sometimes permitted,[62] in order that crops commenced by decedent may be completed for the benefit of the estate;[63] and a personal representative who finds a

The administrator advanced no money either for margin or interest, but whatever the brokers required was obtained by sales or transfers of stock. For about six months after his appointment the stocks had a current market value that varied but little, and with reasonable effort he could have sold the same at any time during that period with advantage to the estate, but with the consent of the heirs he held them for better prices or for distribution. [a] Nature of business.—A statute authorizing the executor to carry on the "plantation, manufactory, or business" of the testator includes a mercantile business. Dwyer v. Kalteyer, 68 Tex. 554, 5 SW 75.

[b] Partnership business. — (1) The statute confers no authority on the personal representative of a deceased partner to carry on the partnership business or administer the partnership estate. The business must be such as employs property which is a part of the estate to be administered by the executor or administrator, whereas a partnership estate, on the death of one of the partners, is to be administered by the survivor or survivors. Altgelt v. Alamo Nat. Bank, 98 Tex. 252, 83 SW 6 [rev (Civ. A.) 79 SW 582]. [§ 476] b. Furst v. Armstrong, 202 Pa. 348, 51 A 996, 90 AmSR 653.

[c] Estoppel to object to payment of claims.—Where testator directed that his sons should continue his business after the death of his wife, and one of his sons, who was sole executor, carried on the business with the acquiescence of the widow and testator's children, his legatees, and the widow received her living exgeneral rule is that even under such circumstances the representative is personally liable for all debts contracted in carrying on the business,[79] unless he exacts an agreement from the person with whom he deals to look to the funds of the estate exclusively,[80] although he has a right to be indemnified out of the estate.[81] In a proper case the creditors may be subrogated to the representative's right of indemnity,[82] and it has also been held that they may maintain a suit in equity to charge the estate where the executor is insolvent.[83] Where executors under the will of a testator, who had been conducting a mercantile and manufacturing business on borrowed capital, not being authorized by the will to carry on the business, but carrying it on by agreement of all parties interested for the purpose of preserving the business as a going concern, in good faith borrowed money from the mother of one of the executors to use in the business, the son under authority from the other executors signing the note in the name under which the testator conducted the business by himself "as executor," and the money was used in discharging debts of the business and later the executors sold the business to a purchaser who agreed to assume and pay all debts incurred by the executors in carrying on the business, it was held that the lender could maintain a suit in equity to recover the amount of the loan from the purchaser.[84]

[§ 479] (2) What Assets Liable. Where the representative is authorized to carry on the business, only such assets of the estate as are invested in the business at the time of decedent's death can be considered as trade assets, and in the absence of some clear authority in the will the other property of the estate cannot be subjected to the risks of trade, or be made liable for debts contracted by the representative in carrying on the Matter of Hickey, 34 Misc. 360, 69 NYS 844. Torts of representative generally see infra § 592.

[b] Use of profits.—An executor who carries on business under authority of a will, and uses the profits in payment of rightful charges, is not individually liable to a creditor of the business for misappropriation. Eisenstadt Mfg. Co. v. Copeland, (Civ. A.) 149 SW 713.

[c] Liability of coexecutors.—In an action against executors for the price of goods sold, where the jury found that the son of decedent, one of the executors, or some of the heirs, notified plaintiff after the testator's death that the business would be conducted by them, and that the son alone managed the estate by authority of the will, and that the business was closed out, and that the profits went to the support of the testator's children, the other executors who did not participate in the conduct of such business were not individually liable for any debt not incurred by the testator. In re Johnson, 15 Ch. D. 548.

[b] The executor's inability to account does not result in a loss of his right to indemnity from the estate for debts incurred in the business, and consequently creditors do not lose their right of claiming through that indemnity against the estate. Re Kidd, 70 L. T. Rep. N. S. 648.

[a] Rights of decedent's creditors.—Unless the creditors existing at the death of the decedent in some way consented to the carrying on of the business by the executor, they have the right to insist that the estate, as it existed at decedent's death, shall be used for the payment of their debts and the expenses of administration to the exclusion of debts subsequently created by the executor. But if the business was carried on by the executor with the consent of the original creditors, the creditors of the business must either share pro rata with the other creditors in the whole estate, which is probably the correct rule, or be first paid out of the portion of the estate used in the business. business,[85] although where adequate authority is given by the will, a representative may bind the general assets by a purchase of goods on credit for the business.[86] So where an executor is given "full power" to conduct the business in which testator was engaged, he may carry on all of testator's business interests, and in so doing is not limited to capital invested in the business.[87] Where heirs and general creditors consent to the continuance of the business, the estoppel resulting therefrom relates only to the liability of trade assets, and there is no estoppel to deny the liability of general assets for debts incurred in carrying on such business.[88] Bad debts and losses, and the expense of replacing old articles with new, are properly charged against the profits and not against the capital.[89]

[§ 480] b. Where Continuance of Business Unauthorized. Where an executor or administrator acts without authority in employing the assets of the estate in business, all debts contracted in the course of such business are the personal debts of the representative, and the creditor cannot hold the estate, nor can the representative look to the estate for reimbursement.[90] Where the business has been carried on without any authorization of law, heirs who joined therein, although acting in the best of faith, will be charged with knowledge of the want of capacity of the administrator, and cannot thereafter assert their claims for contributions of money or services, either against the general assets of the estate, in preference to the claims of original creditors, or against the assets thus embarked in the business, in the absence of a showing that the business was conducted at a profit and that the services rendered and the money advanced inured to the benefit of that part of the estate so embarked in the business.[91] But where an administrator continues the business in good faith, at a profit, a subsequent administrator de bonis non will not be permitted to deny the validity of claims presented by sons and heirs of the decedent on account of services rendered and money advanced in connection with the business, and which resulted in increasing that part of the estate.[92]

[a] Partnership business.—An executor who is also the son of the testator cannot be held personally liable as a partner in a banking business in which the testator was a partner, merely because he permits, as executor, the testator's capital to remain in the business, and permits credits to be entered in his passbook as executor for a share of the profits of the business. of any acts on his part raising an estoppel.[93]

[§ 482] 4. Partnership. Ordinarily the death of a partner terminates the partnership,[94] and the personal representative of decedent has as a rule no more right to continue in a business in which decedent was a partner than he has to continue a business of which decedent was the sole proprietor.[95] The executor of a deceased copartner may, however, continue in the business where the will directs him to do so;[96] or the liability of a deceased copartner, as well as his interest in the profits of the concern, may by the copartnership contract be continued beyond his death.[97] The effect of such a contract must naturally be to bind the estate of the deceased partner in the hands of his executor or administrator without compelling such representative to become a partner personally.[98] Where there are no valid provisions by will or contract for further continuing a partnership, either the surviving partner or partners, or else, if necessary the personal representative of the decedent, should see that the business is duly wound up and adjusted.[99] A settlement of partnership affairs made with the surviving partners by the personal representative of a deceased partner is binding on the latter's estate, its creditors and beneficiaries, except in cases of fraud or mistake, and for only the share thus received is the representative presumably liable.[1] The rules which have already been stated with reference to the result of the personal representative engaging in business or continuing the decedent's business[2] apply where the personal

[d] Surviving partner deals with personal representative. — While a surviving partner is usually entitled to control the partnership debts after the death of his copartner, yet his dealings and liability for a settlement should be with the latter's personal representative alone, and not with heirs, distributees, or a surviving widow; and partner or representative must use due diligence and good faith. [h] Circumstances authorizing assent to continuance of partnership and payments pursuant thereto.—Testator was a member of a partnership, the articles of which provided that, in case of testator's death before the expiration of five years, his portion of the capital should not be withdrawn, and that his son should have a right to become a member of the firm. Testator died, his son's demand to be admitted as a partner was refused by the surviving partners, and, on suit by the son and executors to enforce the partnership agreement in this respect, it was held that specific performance of the agreement could not be decreed, but that the action of the surviving partners was a breach of the agreement, entitling the executors and son to a decree of dissolution. The firm was realizing large profits, and its continued existence was desirable to the estate, and the son's continued demand that he be admitted as a partner was finally compromised by an agreement by the surviving partners to pay him three thousands dollars per year, and by the executors on behalf of the estate to pay another person eighty-five hundred dollars per year in consideration of the son's refraining from enforcing a dissolution. Such other person turned over practically all of the money paid to him to the son. This arrangement was not presented to the surrogate's court for approval, but the profits to the estate from the continuance of the business after testator's death amounted to more than the amount testator had invested in the business. It was held that the executors were justified in making the agreement with the son, and were not personally liable for the amount paid him from the estate. representative has participated in the business of a partnership of which decedent was a member during his lifetime, whether he has been duly empowered to do so,[3] or has done so in violation of the general rule forbidding an executor or administrator to engage in business with the funds of the estate.[4] Where the executor of a deceased partner in a banking business allowed testator's capital to remain in the business, and permitted credits to be entered in his pass book as executor for a share of the profits of the business, this was held not to render him personally liable as a partner.[5]

[§ 483] E. Contracts—1. General Rule. It is well settled[6] as a general rule that the contracts of an executor or administrator, although made in the interest and for the benefit of the estate he represents, are, if made upon a new and independent consideration moving between the promisee and the representative as promisor, the personal contracts of the executor or administrator and do not bind the estate.[7] Hence the executor or administrator cannot make any agreement enlarging the

Ont.—Campbell v. Bell, 16 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 115.

"It is a general rule of law, subject to few exceptions, that a personal representative cannot charge the estate by contracts originating with himself, although for the benefit and in the interest and on behalf of the estate, and that for such contracts and claims the remedy is against the executor or administrator in his private capacity." Thompson v. Mann, 65 W. Va. 648, 650, 64 SE 920, 921, 131 AmSR 987, 22 LRANS 1094.

"An executor has no right to create a liability against the estate by making a new and independent contract to pay an alleged debt." Haskell v. Manson, 200 Mass. 599, 602, 86 NE 937, 128 AmSR 452.

[a] "The reason of the rule (1) is clearly explained by Hunt, C. J., in the earliest of the cases cited. [Ferrin v. Myrick, 41 N. Y. 315]. While, as between the executor and the person with whom he contracts, the latter may rely on the contract, the beneficiaries are not concluded by the executor's act, but the propriety of the charge and the liability of the estate therefor must be determined in the accounting of the executor. In an action at law against the executor, the legatees and persons interested in the estate have no opportunity to be heard." O'Brien v. Jackson, 167 N. Y. 31, 33, 60 NE 238. (2) "An agent or executor who covenants in his own name, and yet describes himself as agent or executor, is personally liable, for the obvious reason that the one has no principal to bind, and the other substitutes himself for his principal." Duvall v. Craig, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 45, 56, 4 L. ed. 180.

[b] This rule has been applied to: (1) A contract giving the other party the right to file a mechanic's lien on property of the estate. San Francisco Pav. Co. v. Fairfield, 134 Cal. 220, 66 P 255. (2) A renewal of a lease. Chisolm v. Toplitz, 82 App. Div. 346, 82 NYS 1081 [aff 178 N. Y. 599 mem, 70 NE 1096 mem]. (3) A warranty. Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. 162, 5 AmD 83. (4) A promise that the estate shall continue liable to indemnify a surety on a note given by the decedent's partner and signed by the surety on decedent's promise to indemnify him. Kingman v. Soule, 132 Mass. 285. (5) A contract for necessaries for infant devisees. Roscoe v. McDonald, 91 Mich. 270, 51 NW 939. (6) An agreement to purchase the property of a firm indebted to the testator, in order to collect the debt. Barlow v. Myers, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 286. (7) An agreement to allow a set-off. Bishop v. Dillard, 49 Ark. 285, 5 SW 341. (8) An agreement to pay usurious interest in order to prevent a sale of property on foreclosure. Williams v. Troop, 17 Wis. 463. (9) A forthcoming bond for property levied on under an execution against the testator issued during the testator's lifetime. Thompson v. Ross, 26 Miss. 198. (10) A refunding bond executed by the representative in order to procure a distributive share belonging to the decedent. Maxwell v. Craft, 32 Miss. 307.

[c] Supersedeas bond.—An executor, on appeal from a judgment of the circuit court denying the probate of the will under which he acted, cannot by signing an application for a supersedeas bond necessary to retain possession of the property, bind the estate so as to render the estate liable to sureties on the bond on affirmance. U. S. Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Levering, 156 Ky. 110, 160 SW 790.

[d] A judgment by bond and warrant executed by an administrator does not bind the estate, because it is not a confession of judgment alone, but the bond is a personal obligation. Pinney v. Johnson, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 500.

[e] Purchase of property for estate.—An executor cannot bind the estate of the testator for the price of property which is not absolutely necessary for its preservation. Harding v. Evans, 3 Port. (Ala.) 221, 29 AmD 255; Van Zandt v. Myers, 7 NY WklyDig 390; Harrell v. Witherspoon, 14 S. C. L. 486; Lovell v. Field, 5 Vt. 218.

[f] The public administrator of the county of San Francisco is personally liable on contracts made in relation to estates on which he administers, unless the idea of such liability is excluded by the contract. Dwinelle v. Henriquez, 1 Cal. 387.

[g] The estate is not liable in damages for a breach of a contract entered into by the executrix. Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 492, 51 P 695.

[h] Contract held to be in capacity of legatee.—Where an executrix who was also sole legatee contracted with an attorney to prosecute a suit for land devised to her, and not needed for the payment of the testator's debts, the attorney to receive a certain proportion of the amount recovered, the contract was considered to be that of the legatee and not of the executrix, and hence not voidable by a succeeding administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, as made by an executrix without direction of court. Bell v. Welch, 38 Ark. 139.

[i] Contract of agent.—Where a contract of an agent of an administrator does not relate to a subject matter about which, as administrator, he is authorized to negotiate, he is personally responsible; or, if the agent exceeded his authority, the agent might be liable. Lewis v. Reed, 11 Ind. 239.

he shall not be personally liable thereon will, however, be given effect,[11] and any contract which the personal representative makes relating to the estate will at all events inure to the advantage of its beneficiaries, subject to the due payment of creditors of the estate.[12]

The general rule is subject to exceptions,[13] and the estate may be held liable for promises made by the administrator where in law he has the right to make such promises, or where in law it is his duty without a promise to do just what he has promised to do.[14] So debts incurred for the incidental charges of the due course of administration have been held obligatory upon the estate,[15] and an executor may sometimes create debts against the estate for expenses incurred in complying with the directions of the will,[16] and the necessities of the case may sometimes be such as to permit of the representative binding the estate by his contract made for its benefit,[17] or he may sometimes bind the estate by his contract made with the sanction of the probate court.[18] Power may also be given to an executor by the will to bind the estate by contract,[19] and statutes sometimes give to the representative certain powers in this respect.[20]

[§ 484] 2. Services—a. In General. The personal representative and not the estate is as a rule directly liable to one whom he employs incidentally in the discharge of his trust, as for selling, custody of, or suitable work upon the assets, or clerical or other services in managing the property and the

In the latter case, if unwilling to make himself personally liable he may charge the trust estate in favor of any person who will make the expenditure. Charges against the trust estate in such cases can be enforced only in an equitable action brought for the purpose. To that action the beneficiaries and cestuis que trust are necessary parties. [a] Terms of will.—(1) A direction in a will that the executor shall manage the estate as the testator had been "in the habit of doing" does not authorize him to bind the estate for the services of an overseer or the purchase of work animals. Wade v. Pope, 44 Ala. 690. (2) A provision in a will that "it is my wish that my husband [whom the will appointed sole executor] continue the clothing business as now conducted" does not show any intention to charge the estate with any debt which he might contract in the course of such business. Saperstein v. Ullman, 49 App. Div. 446, 63 NYS 626 (McLennan & Spring, JJ. dis.) [aff 168 N. Y. 636 mem, 61 NE 553 (Vann, Parker & Landon, JJ. dis.)].

[b] Power to sell, (1) especially where the broadest discretion as to terms and conditions is vested in the executors, gives of necessity the power to contract, and with that the power to enforce the contract. Strauss v. Bendheim, 162 N. Y. 469, 56 NE 1007 [rev 44 App. Div. 82, 60 NYS 398]. (2) Such a power authorizes the employment of an agent on commission to aid in making the sale. Ingham v. Ryan, 18 Colo. A. 347, 71 P 899. (3) But a naked power of sale of real estate confers no authority upon executors to contract to charge the estate with the expenses of repairs or improvements. Ashby v. Ashby, 59 N. J. Eq. 547, 46 A 522.

[c] The estate is liable for a breach of contract on the part of the executor or administrator on a sale of real estate which he had purchased on foreclosure of a mortgage taken by him under a power to invest on mortgage and bond. Yerkes v. Richards, 153 Pa. 646, 26 A 221, 34 AmSR 721 [rev 11 LancLRev 308].

[d] Authority to incur expense is not alone sufficient to empower the executor to create obligations against the estate for the funds used. O'Brien v. Jackson, 167 N. Y. 31, 60 NE 238 [rev 42 App. Div. 171, 58 NYS 1044].

like.[21] Where, however, services are rendered under an employment or agreement by which the person rendering them has confined himself to the estate or the personal representative administering it as his debtor, he will not be at liberty afterward to resort to the personal representative individually;[22] and it has been held that under a statute authorizing an administrator to carry on the business, and under an order expressly authorizing a temporary administrator to conduct a hardware business by buying and selling merchandise so that the stock should not deteriorate, the administrator had authority to employ an agent to purchase goods for the business, and to bind the estate for compensation for the agent.[23] Where services have been performed without the executor's assent, before his appointment, and under a contract with another executor named in the will, or with a special administrator, the executor is not liable either personally or in his representative capacity.[24] Where the will imposed a legal obligation on executors to employ a named person in their conduct of testator's business, it was not requisite to liability of the estate that the executors should make a new contract of employment with such person.[25]

[§ 485] b. Services of Attorney. The rule that debts contracted by the personal representative are obligatory upon him as individual obligations and do not primarily bind the estate applies to the fees of attorneys and counsel employed by him in the course of administration. The executor or administrator makes himself personally liable to such attorney or counsel and reimburses himself in his accounts subject to the court's allowance.[26] But authority conferred by statute on executors and administrators to carry on the plantation of the decedent authorizes them to incur debts for supplies advanced for that purpose. Reinstein v. Smith, 65 Tex. 247; Primm v. Mensing, 14 Tex. Civ. A. 395, 38 SW 382. (2) But statutory authority to carry on the decedent's plantation and keep the buildings in tenantable repair confers no authority to contract to pay for permanent improvements placed on the land. "When an executor contracts for the performance of services which are for the benefit of the estate which he represents, without limiting his liability, his contract is personal, and he is liable to the same extent, and may be sued in his individual capacity, the same as he would or could be for services rendered for his personal benefit." Reynolds-McGinness Co. v. Green, supra.

[a] Mere intention does not govern.—The question whether an administrator is personally liable for services rendered by another person does not depend on such person's intention merely. Foland v. Dayton, 40 Hun (N. Y.) 563.

[b] Persons dealing with representative chargeable with notice.—Under a statute authorizing the administrator to procure indispensable labor to care for live stock, crops, etc., left by decedent, "until the meeting of the court," and providing that the court may authorize the employment of further labor, all persons dealing with such administrator are chargeable with notice of the fact that he can exercise such power only in vacation. Powell v. Powell, 23 Mo. A. 365.

[d] A lien on the estate cannot be created by the executor or administrator for services rendered by a third person to the estate. McMahon v. Allen, 4 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 519.

[e] Where an executor employs a broker to sell land of the estate he acts in his individual capacity, and is individually liable for the broker's services, as he has no capacity to create a liability against the estate, being only entitled to credit in his accounts for expenditures made in good faith and for proper purposes. Hickman-Coleman Co. v. Leggett, 10 Cal. A. 29, 100 P 1072 (holding also that the court could not fix compensation without his request, as the allowance must be made to him and not to the broker). To same effect McFarland v. Howell, 162 Iowa 110, 143 NW 860; Rosenthal v. Schwartz, 214 Mass. 371, 101 NE 1070.

[f] Employment of broker to negotiate loan.—An executor is not liable in his representative capacity for broker's commissions in procuring a loan, which was refused, for a sum in excess of the amount the executor was authorized to borrow. McMahon v. Smith, 136 App. Div. 839, 121 NYS 736 [app dism 202 N. Y. 587 mem, 96 NE 1121 mem].

[g] Estoppel of heirs. — Auctioneers relying upon invalid contract with executors and upon confirmation of their conduct by other heirs are entitled to a just allowance for expenditures made in reliance on the contract. Barbee v. Penny, 174 N. C. 571, 94 SE 295.

[a] Payment made at representative's peril.—Since an administrator's attorney sustains no relation to the estate, money paid by the administrator to the attorney for services from the funds of the estate are paid at the administrator's peril, until the court has duly adjudicated the administrator's claim for its allowance, after hearing on notice to all persons interested. In re Sullivan, 36 Wash. 217, 78 P 945.

[d] The probate court has no jurisdiction (1) to render judgment against an administrator as such for services rendered by an attorney employed by such administrator to prosecute a claim on behalf of the estate, because the liability of the administrator is personal and not in his representative capacity. Pike v. Thomas, 62 Ark. 223, 35 SW 212, 54 AmSR 292. To same effect State v. Second Judicial Dist. Ct., 25 Mont. 33, 63 P 717. (2) Nor can its sanction sustain a conveyance of land of the estate in payment for professional services rendered. Teal v. Terrell, 48 Tex. 491.

[e] An attorney will not be directed to refund money paid to him by the administrator pursuant to an order improperly obtained. In re Sullivan, 36 Wash. 217, 228, 78 P 945, 948 ("As we have hereinbefore seen, the attorney sustains no relation to the estate, and is not a party thereto. The administrator is the party before the court who must account for the funds of the estate. The adjustment of the amount of attorney's fees that shall be paid is a matter between him and his attorney. But if paid from funds of the estate, he must know that he cannot be protected in its disbursement until the court has ordered it paid after a hearing, with interested parties before the court, either by notice or otherwise. We therefore decline to make any order directed to Mr. McCafferty, but leave him and the administrator to adjust their own affairs. It is, however, now ordered, that Mr. O'Brien, the administrator, shall return to the funds of the estate all moneys paid out by him under said so-called orders").

[g] Effect of allowance. — (1) Credit to the representative in his account for an attorney's fee does not constitute a judgment or adjudication in favor of the attorney against either the estate or the representative, and cannot be made the foundation of an action by him against either. The decree only fixes the allowance of the fee as expense to the administrator. McKee v. Soher, 138 Cal. 367, 71 P 438, 649. (2) On the other hand the amount when allowed becomes a demand against the estate in favor of the attorney and can be pursued as such if not paid by the legal representative. Smith v. Rhodes, 68 Oh. St. 500, 68 NE 7; In re Mills, 40 Or. 424, 67 P 107.

[h] When not liable.—One expecting to be appointed an executor was not personally liable on his contract with an attorney for services to the succession and interested parties, made before his qualification as executor in fact, where the attorney knew that he had no authority, and circumstances were equally known to them, and where there was no misrepresentation or concealment. James v. Turner, 78 Tex. 241, 14 SW 574; Portis v. Cole, 11 Tex. 157.

that the attorney employed to render services beneficial to the estate shall look to the estate alone for recompense.[28] So also an attorney employed by a personal representative is sometimes allowed compensation directly from the estate where the personal representative is insolvent,[29] and the statutes sometime authorize an executor to bind the estate for the payment to attorneys of a reasonable compensation for services which are necessary in the course of administration.[30] It has also been held that an executor may bind the estate by the employment of counsel to defend the will when this is contested.[31]

[§ 486] 3. Funeral Expenses, Tombstones, Etc. While the general rule denying the power of the representative to bind the estate by his contracts[32] has been applied so as to hold the executor or administrator who has ordered the funeral of, or a tombstone for, his decedent liable only personally and not in his representative capacity,[33] although with a right of reimbursement for his expenditure against the estate,[34] the better view is that such expenses are charges against the estate, which the representative must pay out of the assets and for which he is liable in his representative capacity.[35]

[§ 487] 4. Payment of Decedent's Debts.[36] An executor or administrator may bind the estate by a promise to pay the debt which is a just and clear liability of the estate,[37] and a promise to pay a debt of decedent in consideration of assets is a promise in his representative capacity and will support a judgment de bonis testatoris or de bonis decedentis.[38] His authority in this respect is limited, however, to the amount of assets in his hands, and he can in no case bind the heir or devisee;[39] while with respect to himself, as he is not bound to pay the debts beyond the assets which he receives, he is not presumed to intend binding himself for payments in a more extensive sense, and hence even his unequivocal promise, written or oral, to pay a debt of his decedent, does not make him personally liable therefor unless it is founded on some sufficient consideration other than the existence of the debt.[40] Nevertheless, in various instances, such as extension, forbearance by the creditor, or a substitution of securities, the executor or administrator may make himself personally liable by his direct promise to pay, as for a new and sufficient consideration,[41] and it has been considered that his direct promise may bind him absolutely if the debt

[a] Promise on which decedent

of the decedent was already barred by limitations.[42]

[§ 488] 5. Borrowing Money.[43] An executor or administrator, as such, has no inherent authority to borrow money, and loans to the representative do not constitute valid claims against the estate or entitle the lender to interest thereon, although the representative may make himself personally liable;[44] and the rule in this respect is not changed by the fact that the money was borrowed for the benefit of the estate,[45] although under such circumstances there may be a right of subrogation.[46] Power to borrow money on lien security may, however, be given by will,[47] and statutes are sometimes found which sanction borrowing with the creation of a lien, although usually upon due investigation and a previous order from the court.[48] Where a loan was made under circumstances rendering the estate liable therefor, the lender is not required, as a condition of preserving his rights against the estate, to see to the application of the money lent.[49] Where the personal representative may borrow money for the benefit of the estate, it has been held that he may procure such money beyond the border of the state in which his letters were granted.[50]

[§ 489] 6. Bills and Notes. An executor or could not be sued.—Although a husband could not be sued at law on his promise to repay to his wife money received by him for her during her coverture, his executors might be sued on their promise to repay such money. Rusling v. Rusling, 47 N. J. L. 1.

[b] Sufficiency of consideration.—The surrender to an administrator of a promissory note made by his intestate, whether the note at the time of the surrender is capable or incapable of being enforced at law, is a sufficient consideration for the giving of a new note by the administrator, and he is personally liable thereon, although when the new note is given, his final account has been allowed, and no new assets have since come into his hands. Wilton v. Eaton, 127 Mass. 174.

[c] Where legatees agreed that the executors might renew a certain note of the testator, barred during his lifetime, and the executors gave a note in renewal, they had no further authority to borrow money from another to pay the renewal note. O'Kelly v. McGinnis, 141 Ga. 379, 81 SE 197.

[d] Purchasing security to evade taxation.—It was not lawful or proper for a personal representative to borrow money on the credit of the estate for the sole purpose of purchasing securities exempt from taxation, in order to hold them until the time for assessing property for taxation had passed, thereby to evade taxation. Wheelwright v. Rhoades, 28 Hun (N. Y.) 57, 11 Abb NCas 382.

[e] Acknowledgment as distinguished from creation of debt.—Where a father having died largely in debt, the representative of his succession, in order to pay off his indebtedness, was authorized by the judge, on the recommendation of a family meeting, to borrow a sufficient sum to discharge this indebtedness, and notes were given upon this loan, this was not the creation of a debt, but was the acknowledgment of one, and providing means to pay it, all of which was done in the interest of the heirs; and the liability of a son therefore was fixed by his interest in his father's succession. [a] Illustrations.—(1) Where a will authorized and empowered the executor "to do any and all things concerning my estate that I could do if living, leaving it to his judgment and discretion as to how he shall manage the same or carry on my business and giving to him full power and authority to sell and convey any or all of my real estate when in his judgment it may be desirable to do so," the executor had power to borrow money to carry on the business of the estate. Schlickman v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 139 Ky. 268, 272, 275, 129 SW 823, 29 LRANS 264 ("We are of opinion that the executor, Pieper, was authorized, under the power given him by the fifth clause of the will, to borrow money to carry on the business of the packing company, and that the entire estate of decedent was bound therefor; and it is immaterial whether he signed these notes as principal or as surety, so long as it was to enable the company to raise money necessary to properly carry on its business, or rather, to carry on the business in a way which he deemed to be proper. The estate, in either event was bound therefor"). (2) A will expressing entire confidence in the person named as executor and giving to him the entire management, control, and disposition of the assets of the estate confers power on the executor to borrow money to pay debts on his note as executor. Prieto v. Leonards, 32 Tex. Civ. A. 205.

[b] Borrowing more than necessary.—Where a will authorizes an executor to raise, in such way as seems best to him, sufficient money to pay testator's debts, and he borrows a short time after testator's death more money than is necessary to pay the debts, the estate is liable to the lender for the full amount, if there is no fraud or collusion between the executor and the lender, and the latter had no notice of the amount of the debts, since he is not bound to ascertain whether there are debts of the testator or not. Fletcher v. American Trust, etc., Co., 111 Ga. 300, 36 SE 767, 78 AmSR 164.

usually considered that the rule is not affected by the fact that the note or acceptance is given for a debt of decedent,[56] or that the representative signs as "executor" or "administrator"[57] and designates by name the estate which he represents,[58] that the promise in the body of the note is made as executor or administrator,[59] or that the note is given as a renewal of a note executed by decedent.[60] But although the executor or administrator is bound out of his own property in the first instance, he may reimburse himself out of the assets where the consideration was just and beneficial to the estate and the obligation was honestly incurred,[61] although not otherwise.[62] Statutes sometimes permit of borrowing upon note, usually with the assent of the probate court,[63] and upon a note executed under such circumstances the representative is not personally liable.[64] So also power to bind the estate by giving a note may be conferred by the terms of the will.[65]

Executors cannot waive notice of protest upon a note made by their testatrix, or by any act create a liability against the estate which does not already exist.[66]

[§ 490] 7. Guaranty or Suretyship. The usual rights and liabilities of guaranty or suretyship are protected and enforced in the case of a decedent's assets;[67] but the executor or administrator cannot directly bind the estate by his own new promise by way of guaranty or suretyship, although the transaction be one affecting decedent's own promise and liability, but charges himself primarily and personally by his undertaking.[68] So also where an estate was not liable upon a guaranty agreement executed by decedent, the administratrix could not, by acquiescence and recognition, create such liability.[69]

[§ 491] 8. Subrogation of Contracting Party. While a person who lends or advances money to an executor or administrator upon a promise by note or other contract acquires no right at law or in equity against the estate, unless the money has in fact been applied to pay debts or otherwise to benefit the estate, he will in such case be permitted to take the representative's place and be subrogated to his right of reimbursement from the estate.[70]

Invest. As a general rule the duty of an executor or administrator is confined to collecting and paying out or distributing the assets of the estate,[71] and it is no part of his duty to invest funds belonging to the estate.[72] This duty may, however, be imposed upon him by will [73] or by statute,[74] or a duty to invest may sometimes arise from the necessities of the case, where there is considerable and unavoidable delay in settling up the estate and making final distribution.[75]

[§ 493] 2. Duties and Liabilities with Respect to Investments. In making investments of the funds of the estate, the representative acts as trustee rather than as executor or administrator,[76] and his duties and liabilities in respect to such investments are governed by the same rules as apply to other trustees. If the will contains directions as to the investments to be made these must be followed. The representative is entitled, although not obliged, to apply to the court for advice and directions, and the sanction of the court for any investment, procured before the investment is made, will, in the absence of fraud in procuring such sanction, protect the representative. Where he acts upon his own judgment he is held to absolute good faith and is required to exercise such prudence and good judgment as ordinarily prudent persons exercise in making investments of their own funds, and if he has done this he is not responsible for a resulting loss. But he is liable for all losses resulting from unauthorized or improper investments, or from his lack of good faith, prudence, or diligence; while on the other hand, if any unauthorized or improper investment or use of the funds of the estate results in a profit, such profit belongs, at the election of those interested, to the estate.[77]

[§ 494] 3. Liability for Investing without Authority. Where the executor or administrator lends or invests assets without authority of law or some power conferred by the will, the beneficiaries may elect to charge him with the fund thus used or to accept the investment with all its accretions of value.[78] Where the investment is repudiated and the representative charged personally, the fund

[b] Duration of power.—A will directed the executors to sell testator's property, and divide the residue among his sons and daughters, leaving to the executors' discretion, subject to certain provisions, as to the time and mode of closing testator's business and realizing his estate, the investing and reinvesting of the moneys of the children, and directed that when the estate should be finally settled the children's shares should be invested in fee simple ground rents or stock in their respective names, and be managed by their guardians until their majority, the sons' shares to be given to them absolutely at their majority. It was held that the power given the executors to invest and reinvest refers to the period while they were settling the estate, and was not intended to apply to the children's shares after the shares were ascertained and invested as directed. [§ 495] G. Interest on Funds of Estate—1. In General. Originally executors and administrators were not chargeable in any event with interest on the funds of the estate in their hands,[80] but this rule has long since been abrogated, and it is now well settled that such charge may be made.[81] Upon general principles the personal representative is bound to render account of all interest or profit actually received by him out of the assets of the estate,[82] but where no interest was actually received, the representative is not chargeable with interest unless there are special circumstances to warrant such a charge, as where the representative makes some misuse of the funds for intended profit, or unreasonably detains them, or fails duly to invest and make the funds productive, or is guilty of negligence in collecting or in accounting for them.[83] In some states, however, the latter rule has been

[b] Interest received after final settlement.—Although the decree of the ordinary settling the accounts of an administrator did not charge him with interest, by reason of the unproductiveness of the funds in his hands, yet if he actually receives it afterward he may be compelled to account. [c] An exception to the general rule is where a balance has been generally due the administrator, on his account, larger than the balance in his hands as administrator. In such case interest received by the administrator should not be charged against him. Mathes v. Bennett, 21 N. H. 188.

"The general rule has been, not to charge executors with interest when their accounts are settled in ordinary course; and the reason is, that they are not at liberty to risk the money belonging to the estate which they represent, and are to be always ready to pay it over, according to the directions of the will, or the decree of the Probate Court. They ought not to be presumed to have made a profitable use of it; because it would be contrary to their duty to use it at all. This rule admits of an exception, when it shall appear that the executors have actually made use of the money; and this fact may be proved by direct testimony, or may be inferred from a long delay in settling their accounts, or in paying over balances in their hands after they have been demanded, and perhaps from other circumstances." Wyman v. Hubbard, 13 Mass. 232.

[a] Grounds of liability for interest.—(1) The idea seems formerly to have been entertained that the court, in the exercise of a quasi criminal jurisdiction, would compel executors and administrators to pay interest as a penalty for a direct breach of trust. Saltmarsh v. Barrett, 29 Beav. 474, 54 Reprint 711; Pearse v. Green, 1 Jac. & W. 137, 37 Reprint 327. (2) But this has been disavowed by the more recent decisions, the result of which is to leave the practice of charging interest on the ground that the executor or administrator either has made or must be taken to have made interest by his use of the trust moneys. Matter of Collyer, 124 App. Div. 16, 108 NYS 600; Schieffelin v. Stewart, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 620, 7 AmD 507; Turney v. Williams, 7 Yerg. (Tenn.) 172; Vyse v. Foster, L. R. 8 Ch. 309; Burdick v. Garrick, L. R. 5 Ch. 233, 5 ERC 565; Atty.-Gen. v. Alford, 4 De G. M. & G. 843, 53 EngCh 659, 43 Reprint 737. (3) The principle upon which the court acts in charging executors with interest is not that of punishment, but of compensating the cestui que trust and depriving the trustee of the advantage he has wrongfully obtained. Inglis v. Beaty, 2 Ont. A. 453.

[b] An oath or affidavit that he has not used the funds is sometimes required to relieve the representative from liability for interest. Smyley v. Reese, 53 Ala. 89, 25 AmR 598; Bendall v. Bendall, 24 Ala. 295, 60 AmD 469; Hollis v. Caughman, 22 Ala. 478; McCreeliss v. Hinkle, 17 Ala. 459; Parker v. McGaha, 11 Ala. 521.

[c] Interim between successive administrations.—Where an administrator died with funds of the estate in his hands, and administration was not granted again for three years, the estate of the first administrator was not liable for interest during the time the estate of his intestate was unrepresented. Davis v. Wright, 20 S. C. L. 560.

[d] Reasonableness of charge.—It was error arbitrarily to charge an administrator, in auditing his account, with interest at ten per cent on all moneys received by him from ten days after receipt thereof, without any investigation as to whether it was reasonable to do so. Howard v. Manning, 65 Ark. 122, 44 SW 1126.

[e] Executor indebted to and holding claim against estate.—Where, on an accounting by an executor, it was found that he was indebted to the estate, and that he had a valid claim against the estate for an amount in excess of his indebtedness, it was error to charge him with interest on his debt without allowing him interest on his claim. In re Sutton, 200 Pa. 158, 49 A 775.

[f] The probate court has the same powers that courts of equity possess in relation to the interest to be charged against executors and administrators in favor of the estate. Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 676.

[g] Burden of proof.—(1) Where an executor is excused from making interest on the funds in his hands, the burden is upon those who would charge him with interest to show that he has received it. Chestnut v. Strong, 11 S. C. Eq. 146. (2) The burden is on the representative to show that he kept the funds unemployed and received no interest. Graham v. Davidson, 22 N. C. 155; Burnside v. Robertson, 28 S. C. 583, 6 SE 843. (3) The burden rests on those who seek to charge the representative to show that he kept the funds an unreasonable length of time, or used them in his private business, or derived profit therefrom. In re Sylvar, 1 Cal. A. 35, 81 P 663; In re Sarment, 123 Cal. 331, 55 P 1015; Walis v. Walker, 37 Cal. 424, 99 AmD 290; Collier's Est., 30 Pa. Co. 607. (4) The burden of proof shifts after two years from the qualification of the representative. Howe v. Winn, 150 Ky. 667, 670, 150 SW 842 ("It is the duty of a personal representative to use ordinary care to make the trust funds in his hands productive of interest; that is, he should use such care in handling the trust funds as a man of ordinary prudence would use in handling his own money to make it productive of interest. The duty rests upon him from the time he qualifies. Until the expiration of two years he is chargeable with such interest as he realizes, or should realize, where under the circumstances, by ordinary care, interest should be realized. But the presumption is in his favor during this period, and he is only to be charged with interest that he did not realize, where he is affirmatively shown to have been remiss in his duty. On the other hand, after the expiration of two years, he is prima facie chargeable with interest on the surplus in his hands, and the burden is on him to show that by reason of circumstances beyond his control he was unable, in the exercise of ordinary care, to earn interest on the fund"). To the same effect Trible v. Ellison, 1 Ky. Op. 59.

[h] Waiver of claim to interest.—Where an administrator's final report accurately indicated the amount of money held by him at different periods during the five years of his administration, such report was sufficient to put persons interested in the estate on inquiry with respect to the administrator's use of the funds and his liability for interest, and their consent to his discharge constituted a waiver of their claim thereto. [§ 496] 2. Propriety of Charge as Affected by Particular Circumstances—a. Failure to Invest or Deposit. It is the duty of an executor or administrator to use ordinary care to make the trust funds in his hands productive from the time he qualifies,[86] and if he fails to invest or deposit funds as he might or should have done in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, he is chargeable with interest thereon, especially if he has been wanting in good faith.[87] A reasonable period may be allowed him for exercising his duty in this respect, at

[a] Illustrations.—(1) The statute renders an executor or administrator prima facie chargeable with interest, although with the utmost diligence he may proceed in the administration of the estate, unless he denies on oath that he has used the funds of the estate. If such oath is made and is not controverted, it is the mandate of the statute that he shall not be charged with interest. The court has no discretion, and all inquiry into his liability is foreclosed. Clark v. Knox, 70 Ala. 607, 45 AmR 93; Ivey v. Coleman, 42 Ala. 409; King v. Cabiness, 12 Ala. 598. (2) But even if the exculpatory oath is made and not controverted, the executor or administrator is chargeable with interest if the circumstances of the case show that he has been guilty of any unreasonable or unnecessary delay in settling or distributing the estate (Eubank v. Clark, 78 Ala. 73; May v. Green, 75 Ala. 162; Mims v. Mims, 39 Ala. 716), or (3) if it is shown that he either appropriated the funds to his own private use, or to some other illegal purpose, or kept them in his hands unemployed while outstanding debts against the estate were drawing interest (Pearson v. [a] The representative should be charged with interest: (1) Where he suffers funds to lie idle, while outstanding demands draw interest. Pearson v. Darrington, 32 Ala. 227. (2) Where he neglects unreasonably long to invest or deposit, after being directed or authorized to do so by a court (Nunn v. Nunn, 66 Ala. 35; Monk v. Pinckney, 30 S. C. Eq. 279), or (3) by the decedent's will (Benson v. Bruce, 4 S. C. Eq. 463; Jenkins v. Fickling, 4 S. C. Eq. 369; Lenoir v. Winn, 4 S. C. Eq. 65, 6 AmD 597; Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh (36 Va.) 484; Garrett v. Carr, 3 Leigh (30 Va.) 407). (4) Where he keeps funds of the estate unproductive, when they ought reasonably to have been made productive. Hook v. Payne, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 252, 20 L. ed. 887; Blake v. Pegram, 100 Mass. 541; Darrel v. Eden, 3 S. C. Eq. 241, 4 AmD 613; Riley v. McInlear, 61 Vt. 254, 17 A 729, 19 A 996. (5) Where he knows that balances will be long in his hands before he pays over. Sunday's App., 131 Pa. 584, 18 A 931; Woods v. Creditors, 4 Vt. 256. (6) Where his excuse is trivial and not pertinent to the issue. Duncan v. Dent, 26 S. C. Eq. 7.

[b] Where an executor sells land under a power of sale given in the will, depositing the proceeds to his own credit in banks, and the balances in the banks at his death are a part of such deposit, his executors must account to the legal representatives of the estate of which he was the executor for the amount of such balances with the interest which they might have received if they had deposited the funds with a trust company. Matter of Clark, 69 Misc. 527, 127 NYS 888.

[c] Where the current receipts exceed the necessary expenses, and there appears to be no necessity for keeping a large balance on hand, the executor must invest the excess, otherwise he will be chargeable with the interest it might have earned. Tebbs v. Carpenter, 1 Madd. 290, 56 Reprint 107.

[d] Where the representative unnecessarily collects money (1) which was drawing interest, and allows it to remain idle, he is chargeable, according to some authorities, with interest on the sum collected. Matter of Lazarus, 13 Hawaii 242; Shakespeare v. Markham, 10 Hun 311 [aff 72 N. Y. 400]; Matter of Bradley, 2 NYS 751, 1 Conn. Surr. 106; Lyendecker v. Eisemann, 3 Dem. Surr. (N. Gerst, Moseley 98, 25 Reprint 293. (2) But other authorities hold that since the executor or administrator is charged with the duty of collecting the assets of the estate and is made liable for losses caused by his neglect of that duty, it is largely for him to determine the propriety of retaining any investments. In re McQueen, 44 Cal. 584; Lund v. Lund, 41 N. H. 355. (3) Certainly where money is withdrawn under the order and direction of the court, the representative is not liable for interest. Dorris v. Miller, 105 Iowa 564, 75 NW 482.

[e] Distant legatees.—The mere fact that the legatees were at a distance and might call for their money when it was not in hand does not excuse an executor from invest-the expiration of which his liability becomes fixed [88] unless he shows good reason or excuse for the further delay.[89] In cases where the executor or administrator has not actually received interest or used the funds of the estate for his own purposes, but has permitted them to lie idle when they might have been productively employed for the benefit of the estate, it is a matter of discretion with the court, on consideration of all the circumstances of the case, whether interest shall be charged,[90] the question being as to the exercise of good faith and due diligence on his part as custodian of the particular fund;[91] and in the absence of any governing statute, the courts are not inclined to charge the personal representative where his conduct was honest and not unreasonable, if he has made no personal use of the fund, where circumstances justify him in not actively investing or placing it at interest, and even where he was merely inert in failing to do so.[92]

ing the fund in hand, if there was no reason for expecting them to demand payment soon after the testator's death. King v. Berry, 3 N. J. Eq. 261.

[f] Unknown distributees. — An executor who retains in his hands the share of a distributee whose residence is unknown is liable for interest thereon after the expiration of one year, if he neglects to invest it. Lana v. Kech, 11 LegInt (Pa.) 31.

[g] Even if the beneficiaries are infants and no guardian has been appointed, the executor or administrator may be chargeable with interest on the funds kept idle in his hands. Sanderson v. Sanderson, 20 Fla. 292; Bitzer v. Hahn, 14 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 232; Flintham's App., 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 16; Wilvert's Est., 11 Pa. Dist. 660, 26 Pa. Co. 644, 5 Dauph. Co. (Pa.) 161.

[h] Failure of the beneficiaries to apply for an order compelling investment of the fund does not affect the liability of the representative. In re Lackie, (Iowa) 171 NW 679.

[i] Where questions of doubt prevent an executor from lending out the funds, he is not chargeable with interest until the expiration of a year after his qualification. Brooks v. Brooks, 12 S. C. 422.

"Whenever an administrator manifestly intends fairly to do his duty, the rule should be not to hold him liable upon slight grounds." Gwynn v. Dorsey, 4 Gill & J. (Md.) 453, 460.

[a] A distinction exists (1) in this particular between an executor or administrator and other fiduciaries in that it is the duty of such other fiduciaries to make interest, and they are therefore prima facie charged with it, while an executor or administrator is not charged with that duty, and has not, ordinarily, powers which will enable him to make interest. Clark v. Knox, 70 Aa. 607, 45 AmR 93. (2) "Courts are more reluctant to charge executors and administrators than to charge trustees for suffering funds committed to them to remain unproductive." Matter of Mapes, 5 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 446, 447.

[c] Where an executor's final accounting was delayed by litigation, and he derived no benefit from the retention of money held for the payment of a legacy subsequently declared invalid, meanwhile making all requested advances to exceptant, he is not chargeable with interest for failure to invest such money pending final settlement. In re Corle, 61 N. J. Eq. 409, 48 A 1027.

[d] Deposit with counsel. — An executor or administrator who deposits the funds of the estate with his counsel, but derives no profit from them, is not chargeable with interest. Pratt's Est., 3 LancLRev (Pa.) 203.

[e] Where an application for an order to lend has been refused by the court the representative cannot thereafter be charged with interest on the money. Ex p. Walsh, 26 Md. 495.

[f] Where an administrator appeals from an order of settlement and distribution, and it is not shown that he did or could have invested the funds in his hands profitably in the meantime, or that he failed to prosecute the appeal with diligence, he is not chargeable personally with interest upon the funds in his hands for the time occupied in the prosecution and determination of the appeal. In re Davis, 33 Mont. 539, 88 P 957.

[g] Money received from time to time in varying sums.—An executor should not be charged with interest on moneys in his hands previous to the accounting, where it appears that he received such moneys, not in bulk, but in varying sums as from time to time the amounts due on the different securities were paid, and where he settled his account promptly, he being under no obligation to make temporary investments of it. Wyckoff v. O'Neill, 71 N. J. Eq. 729, 71 A 388 [rev on other grounds 72 N. J. Eq. 880, 67 A 32].

Ont.—McLennan v. Heward, 9 Grant. Ch. (U. C.) 178.

[a] Reason for rule.—"The mixing of the trust moneys with the trustee's own funds, and using them himself, or lending them to his friends temporarily, and under the expectation that the money would be promptly replaced, before it was wanted for the purposes of the trust, is one of the most common causes of the loss of trust funds, in the hands of executors, receivers and guardians, and other trustees. And the safety of those whose property is necessarily placed in the hands of trustees, makes it the imperative duty of the court to restrain and discourage such breaches of trust, by charging those who thus deal with the funds intrusted to their care, with interest." Utica Ins. Co. v. Lynch, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 520, 525.

[b] The principle on which the rule is founded (1) is that equity will not permit a person holding a position of trust to use the trust property for his own advantage. Davis v. Wright, 20 S. C. L. 560; Lowson v. Copeland, 2 Bro. Ch. 156, 29 Reprint 89; Heathcote v. Hulme, 1 Jac. & W. 122, 37 Reprint 322; Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. Jr. 152, 32 Reprint 63; Powell v. Evans, 5 Ves. Jr. 839, 31 Reprint 886. (2) "It is a favorite doctrine of the courts that a trustee shall not be permitted to make profit out of the trust funds." Anderson v. Gregg, 44 Miss. 170, 182.

[c] A trust company (1) which, as executor of a will, deposits with itself funds of the estate, and issues to itself as such executor certificates of deposit, will be considered as having used the funds in its business, and will be charged with interest accordingly. St. Paul Trust Co. v. Kittson, 62 Minn. 408, 65 NW 74. (2) But actuated by any wrongful intent,[95] or the distributees are unknown,[96] or the will postponed the time of distribution of the estate and did not direct an investment of the funds meanwhile,[97] or the use was during a protracted litigation as to the right to the funds.[98] It is not essential to the representative's liability for interest that he should have derived any benefit from the use of the funds,[99] nor is his liability affected by the fact that he was at all times able [1] and ready [2] to pay over the money if it should be demanded.

Proof of use of funds. A mere suspicion that the representative has used funds of the estate is not sufficient to justify a charge of interest against him;[3] but it is sufficient if there is strong presumptive evidence of such use,[4] if such use can reasonably be inferred from the facts,[5] or if an allegation that the money was so used is not denied.[6]

Option as to interest or profits. The distributees or other beneficiaries of the estate may elect either to charge the personal representative with interest during the whole period, or with the profits actually accruing from his misapplication if these can be ascertained.[7] The option must, however, be exercised where a trust company was one of three executors of an estate, the funds of which were deposited with the trust company, which allowed the usual two per cent interest thereon, the company could not be surcharged with interest in excess of that rate on the theory that it was bound to account for all the profits made out of the estate. In re Moore, 211 Pa. 348, 60 A 991.

[d] Deposit in bank in which representative interested.—(1) The representative has been held not liable for interest merely because he deposited money of the estate in a bank of which he was president (Matter of Johnson, 57 App. Div. 494, 67 NYS 100) [mod on other grounds 170 N. Y. 139, 63 NE 63]; or (2) cashier (Matter of Sudds, 32 Misc. 182, 66 NYS 231 [app dism 75 App. Div. 612 mem, 77 NYS 413]). (3) But otherwise where the executor deposited funds of the estate in a bank of which he was president and a stockholder, and permitted such funds to remain on deposit for a long time without attempting to secure interest thereon, and the bank used the money as part of its working capital. Matter of McKay, 5 Misc. 123, 25 NYS 725. (4) The representative has been held liable where the deposit was in his own private bank (Johnson v. Pulver, 1 Nebr. [Unoff.] 290, 95 NW 697; Matter of Thorp, 31 Misc. 581, 65 NYS 575; Dolan's Est., 15 Pa. Super. 20), or (5) with a banking firm of which he was a member (In re Brewster, 113 Mich. 561, 71 NW 1085). (6) Nevertheless in a case where the administrator, who was a private banker, paying no interest on deposits, kept in his own bank the funds of the estate, which was small and difficult to settle, he should not be charged with interest, when he acted in good faith and his compensation was small compared with his services as administrator. Walker v. Dow, 3 NYS 132, 6 Dem. Surr. 265.

[e] Lending to one's own firm or corporation is a misapplication.—In re Stott, 52 Cal. 403; St. Paul Trust Co. v. Kittson, 62 Minn. 408, 65 NW 74; In re Myers, 131 N. Y. 409, 30 NE 135; Clock v. Apperson, 14 Lea (Tenn.) 553.

[f] Paying mortgage on property in which representative interested.—Where an administrator converted dividend-paying stock of the estate into money, and paid off a mortgage on real estate in which he was interested as heir, and the payment was disallowed, he was charged with interest on the amount from the day of payment, including the period of litigation. Mount v. Van Ness, 35 N. J. Eq. 113.

[g] Mingling with funds of strangers.—An administrator who mingles the funds of the estate with those of strangers in his possession and under his control may be charged with interest thereon, although he receives no individual benefit therefrom. Westover v. Carman, 49 Nebr. 397, 68 NW 501.

[h] Periodical settlements made by an administrator showing that he did not have the funds of the estate invested do not relieve him of liability to account for interest on money used by him, where the settlements do not also show that he was using the money. In re Young, 97 Iowa 218, 66 NW 163.

[i] When interest not chargeable.—(1) Where an executor was garnished, and during the four years for which he held the funds occasionally mingled them with his own for a short time and in no certain amount, but had the amount always at hand and ready to be taken, and the money in his hands had never earned any interest, and the time when the money might be payable under the garnishment was uncertain, it was error to charge him with interest. Candee v. Skinner, 40 Conn. 464. (2) Where an executor took goods from his own store and added to the stock of his intestate in order to make the intestate's stock bring more, and the goods so furnished were not kept separate from the others, and the proceeds of the sale of both were deposited alike in his own name, but it was not charged that he received interest on the trust funds, or unreasonably detained them, he was not chargeable with interest thereon. Field v. Colton, 7 Ill. A. 379. (3) An administrator will not be charged with interest where it is not certain that he used the money of the estate, there being only a suspicion that he did. Grant v. Edwards, 93 N. C. 488.

[j] Funds to which executor is himself entitled.—Where the only party who could claim the interest is the accountant himself, who has acquired the fund by assignment, a formal surcharge for interest is useless. Lakey's Est., 13 Pa. Dist. 533.

[k] Mere commingling not sufficient.—"The mere fact that an administrator mingles the trust funds with his own by depositing the money belonging to the estate in his own name, as he does his individual money, can not be held a sufficient ground to charge the administrator with interest. We are aware of no law which requires an administrator to keep the funds belonging to the estate separate and distinct from his own funds, and in the absence of a legal requirement no liability can be incurred. It might, perhaps, be a good practice for an administrator to keep the trust funds entirely separate from his own funds, and where he deposits in a bank, open the account in his name, as administrator; but so long as the administrator has the money belonging to the estate at his command, ready to answer the order of the court, this is all that the law requires." with respect to the whole period. That is to say the beneficiaries must elect to take either the interest for the whole period, or the profits for the whole period, and cannot demand interest for one part of the time and profits realized during another part.[8]

[§ 498] c. Indebtedness to Estate. An executor or administrator who is indebted to the estate is chargeable with interest on his indebtedness.[9]

[§ 499] d. Failure to Collect Interest. An executor or administrator is chargeable with interest accruing to the estate which should have been collected by him, but which he failed to collect,[10] unless it is made to appear that the interest could not have been collected by the use of reasonable diligence.[11]

[§ 500] e. Loss of Funds of Estate. The question whether an executor or administrator is liable for interest on funds which have been lost to the estate by his acts or omissions, as well as for the principal amount so lost, is the subject of considerable diversity of opinion. It has generally been held in England and Canada that if a loss has occurred by reason of neglect to make collections or payments to the wrong person by mistake, the executor or administrator is not chargeable with interest, because his liability in this respect attaches only as to money which he has actually retained.[12] In the United States, on the other hand, it is generally held that if funds of the estate are lost through the fault of the executor or administrator, either by failure to collect debts or by improper disbursements or investments, he is chargeable with interest on the amount lost, as well as on the principal sum;[13] but the rule is not absolute, and in a number of cases it has been held that interest was not chargeable on funds which had been lost by the executor or administrator.[14]

[§ 501] f. Premature Withdrawal of Commissions. It has been held that, where the representative withdraws money from the estate for his commissions before settlement or the due allowance of "All men are sometimes more or less negligent in their own as well as other people's affairs, and to visit these penalties upon them is calculated to drive the administration of estates into the hands of irre-

commissions, he is chargeable with interest thereon,[15] although he acted in good faith and under advice of counsel;[16] but there is also authority for the view that interest should not be charged on commissions prematurely withdrawn,[17] at least where the action of the representative in this respect was authorized or consented to by the persons beneficially interested in the estate.[18]

[§ 502] g. Delay in Settling Estate. Where there has been long and culpable delay by the representative in accounting or in settling the estate and distributing the residue, interest is chargeable after a reasonable time has elapsed,[19] as under such circumstances it is presumed that he had made use sponsible men. I find this principle running through the cases, and it does seem to me enough to hold this executor liable for the principal sum lost by his negligence, without charging him with interest which it is obvious he has not made, as a fact, nor could have made under the circumstances." Pulliam v. Pulliam, 10 Fed. 53, 67.

(2) Where an administrator appointed Aug. 31, 1895, had a considerable amount of money and cotton belonging to the estate on hand on Jan. 21, 1896, and knew that the principal part of the money in his hands would be credited on a bond which he held against the estate bearing a high rate of interest, he should be charged with interest on the amount in his hands on Jan. 1, 1896, after deducting all expenditures made by him prior to Aug. 31, 1896. Nicholson v. Whitlock, 57 S. C. 36, 35 SE 412.

[d] An executor who illegally withholds the distributive share of a widow, or a portion thereof, is properly chargeable with interest. Leischner v. Kaiser, 156 Ill. A. 123.

[e] Failure to bring into court.—When the assets of an estate are ordered to be brought into court, and are subsequently intrusted to receivers, by consent of all parties, to be invested pending a contest over the validity of the will, an administrator with the will annexed is chargeable with interest on money retained by him, where it is not shown that it was used or kept for the necessary benefit of the estate. McIntire v. McIntire, 14 App. (D. C.) 337.

[f] "What will constitute unreasonable delay in making a settlement, rendering the executor or administrator liable for interest, must depend upon the particular facts and circumstances of each case. The inquiry is whether, in view of these facts and circumstances, a prudent man, dealing with his own funds, for his own interest, would have retained the money unproductive, or would have appropriated it as it was prima facie to be appropriated. The pendency or the just anticipation of suits which, if the event of them was unfavorable, would seriously diminish the assets, complicating the accounts if there was a distribution, may be a good reason for delaying the settlement, and, during

of the funds of the estate;[20] and a demand for settlement is not essential to render him liable.[21] But the representative should not be charged with interest not actually received where the delay was not unreasonable under the circumstances of the case,[22] or was not due to any culpable neglect or misconduct on his part, but was otherwise occasioned, as by some needful judicial preliminaries, the sickness or absence of the judge, litigation, or interference among rival claimants to the fund, the nonascertainment of those actually entitled, the fact that the person entitled could not be found, or similar causes, and he has not used or made any profit on the funds in his hands.[23] And the representative is not chargeable with interest on money retained to pay the distributees if they failed to call for it,[24] although he is liable if he has had the money in his hands for a long time and has not kept it ready for distribution.[25]

A definite time, varying in the different jurisdictions, is generally allowed for the settlement of estates,[26] and within this time an executor or administrator is not generally chargeable with interest, unless he has actually made it, or has used the money for his own purposes.[27] But after the lapse of such period he is prima facie liable for the period of reasonable delay, may justify keeping the moneys without a liability for interest; or, if the amounts involved in such suits are not large, compared with the assets, the keeping without a charge for interest of a sum sufficient to answer the judgments which may be rendered in them. Or, it may be that a part only of the assets has been reduced to money, leaving, without fault of the personal representative, a part uncollected, and it would not be prudent to subject the estate to the costs of a partial settlement and distribution. These and other causes developed by the particular facts of the case may excuse a delay in making settlement and relieve from liability for interest. But when no circumstances exist justifying the retention of the money unproductive, the personal representative must answer for interest. Diligence in making settlements and accounting to those entitled to receive it for the money received is as high a duty, as imperatively demanded by law, as diligence in the collection, or in reducing to money by appropriate proceedings, when a legal necessity exists for the reduction of the property, real or personal, subject to administration." Clark v. Knox, 70 Ala. 607, 620, 45 AmR 93.

[g] Death of representative.— Where delay in settling an administrator's account after his death is not due to his method of handling the estate, or chargeable to his estate, it will be considered settled as of the date of his death, and his estate will be charged with simple interest only on the balance in his hands at the time. Walworth v. Bartholomew, 76 Vt. 1, 56 A 101.

interest on all money coming into his hands,[28] and can relieve himself only by showing an application of the money to the exigencies of the estate.[29]

[§ 503] h. Reservation for Contingencies. An executor or administrator is not necessarily liable to pay interest on a reasonable sum retained in his hands or on deposit to meet expenses and pay judgments recovered against the estate, or so as to abide the contingencies of some litigation concerning assets and the title of parties claimant;[30] but it must appear that the funds were actually kept in hand for the purposes in question.[31] In case the representative finds himself with funds not needed for the purposes mentioned, it is his duty to report that fact to the court and to apply to the court for an order of distribution or for leave to pay the money into court, or for instructions in the premises,[32] and circumstances may arise where, not having procured the protection of the probate court, he may make himself chargeable for interest which the fund would fairly have earned had he dealt prudently with the assets.[33] So an executor retaining funds of the estate to indemnify him for a possible future loss is chargeable with the legal rate of interest from the date of the final settlement of the estate, if he uses the funds in his private business;[34] and if the representative keeps on hand more than is reasonably sufficient for current purposes, he is chargeable with interest on the excess.[35]

The necessity for keeping funds on hand must in any case be determined on consideration of the particular facts involved,[36] and the burden of proving the necessity of so retaining them is on the representative.[37]

During settlement of accounts. If no negligence or improper conduct is imputable to the executor or administrator, interest will not be charged for the time that the account is before the accounting officer in process of settlement,[38] or while exceptions to the account are pending.[39] But if the exceptions are pending for a long time, and the executor or administrator allows the funds to remain unproductive without asking the advice of the court, he should be charged with interest during such time.[40]

[§ 504] i. Other Circumstances—(1) Under Which Interest Properly Charged. Misconduct of a representative may warrant charging him with interest.[41] It has been held proper to charge a personal representative with interest on the amount of a claim improperly paid to himself,[42] on the balance found to be due the estate upon a settlement,[43] on money improperly withdrawn from the estate,[44] on money negligently left in the hands of a debtor,[45] on overpayments to creditors of the estate,[46] on sums in his hands while exceptions to his accounts are pending,[47] on a sum which stands on the record charged to him with his consent as money which he should have put into his account and held as an identified fund,[48] and on sums wrongly paid in an erroneous distribution of the assets.[49] Where a legatee has charged an administrator with the receipt of certain cash, which he has omitted from his inventory of the estate, and after the passage of a consent decree referring the controversy to arbitrators, and providing that, if their finding is against the administrator, he shall be charged with interest on the money, he admits its receipt, and shows that it was disbursed to certain other and special legatees, on his final accounting the administrator should be charged with interest on the money while it was in his possession.[50] Interest is also properly charged where a widow or heir takes profitable possession long before receiving letters of appointment,[51] or, it has been held, where the representative sets up a claim to funds in his hands, which is decided against him.[52] Where money has been kept on deposit, the representative is chargeable with interest which he might have obtained on such deposit,[53] and the same is true of an improper investment which yielded no interest.[54] Where an executor, without order of court, took in his own name new notes and mortgages for the amount of old ones with accrued interest, he was liable as for a loan of the entire sum and was chargeable with interest thereon.[55] Where a surviving executor had possession of the bonds of a certain corporation, and accounted for interest thereon up to a certain date, and the corporation paid the interest on the bonds for six years more, and thereafter the bonds were sold to a reorganization committee, a charge of six years' interest is proper, whether the executor received it or by ordinary diligence could have received it.[56]

[§ 505] (2) Under Which Interest Should Not Be Charged. Interest should not be charged against a representative who manages the estate honestly and well for mere neglect to render an account;[57] neither should he be charged absolutely for interest on money in his hands, if it is in dispute to whom he should pay it, and no negligence or bad faith is to be imputed to him;[58] nor should unearned interest be charged on a distribution earlier than the regular time.[59] Interest is not chargeable on money deposited in bank by order of court,[60] on collections of trifling amount as compared with anticipated outlay,[61] on small balances where neither default in payment nor misconduct appears,[62] or on a sum improperly paid by the executor as counsel fees, for which he is refused credit in his account.[63] Where the representative lived during war in the midst of active hostilities where nearly all business was suspended, he is not readily chargeable for interest not actually received by him.[64] Where the executor had no money of the estate, and was compelled to borrow at times to meet the expenses of administration, he should not be held to pay interest on amounts charged to him by reason of his neglecting to collect assets, if he acted honestly and in good faith, and it is not shown that the assets would have realized any interest had he collected them.[65] Where testator's will gave his wife the income of his property for life, and the executor invested moneys earned by the estate, the income therefrom being paid to the widow, she was not entitled to charge the executor with interest on the sum invested.[66] Interest should not be charged on the value of chattels retained in specie, where they were not of a perishable nature and a sale thereof was not required by the terms of the will or necessary for the payment of debts and legacies;[67] and an executor has been held not chargeable with interest on the value of personal property which he delivered to the legatee, although he borrowed money with which to pay debts.[68] Where estate funds deposited in a national bank of which the executor was chief owner brought no revenue to the bank or to the executor, and were always on hand for payment to those entitled thereto, the executor and trustee would not be charged with interest thereon.[69] Under a will giving testator's widow the net income of the estate until his son reached his majority, after which the income should be divided equally between them, the executors are not chargeable with interest on the amount of the principal paid over to the widow before the majority of the son; but after the son's majority they must pay one half of the interest to him.[70] If executors collect rent under the belief that they are entitled to do so, and do not use it for their own benefit, they are not chargeable with interest for a failure to turn it over to the devisee entitled thereto, where the latter did not object to their collection of such rent.[71] A retention of funds under a fair claim of right to them will not render a personal representative liable for interest;[72] and where executors, through inadvertence and under an order of court, are overpaid as legatees, without fraud or misconduct on their part, they are not chargeable with interest on the amount of the overpayment.[73]

[§ 506] 3. Time from Which Interest Runs. The time from which an executor or administrator will be charged with interest must depend to a large extent upon the circumstances of the particular case.[74] A reasonable time to collect and apply money or to render accounts should be allowed before interest is charged,[75] and interest ought not, as a rule, to be required from him before he actually receives the fund,[76] unless interest comes to his hands.[77] In the absence of any showing that interest was actually received, or that the representative was guilty of any improprieties, interest on the funds of the estate ordinarily begins to run from the time when the estate should have been settled,[78] or, in case there was a duty to invest or make an interest bearing deposit, from the time when such action should have been taken.[79] Where a representative improperly withdraws funds from the estate, interest begins to run from the time of such withdrawal.[80] Where a representative has applied funds of the estate to his own use and profit, he may be charged with interest from the time he received the same,[81] or even from the time of decedent's death,[82] and a charge of interest from the time of the receipt of the fund may be proper in other cases of neglect or misconduct.[83]

When a suit for an accounting has been brought and a balance against the executor or administrator is found by the master, interest should be charged on such balance only from the date of the master's report, where it appears that the executor or administrator acted in good faith, but had misapprehended his duty as to the matters in respect to which he was found chargeable.[84]

Where a will is set aside and a bill is thereafter filed against the person who was acting as executor, for an accounting as to the funds in his hands, he is liable for interest, at least from the time when the bill for the accounting was filed.[85]

Where the representative collected money during the lifetime of decedent as his agent and fails to account for it, he is properly charged with interest from the date of the collection.[86]

[§ 507] 4. Time to Which Interest Computed. An executor who keeps money of the estate in his hands uninvested is chargeable with interest up to the filing of his report,[87] while if the assets were invested at interest, interest is chargeable to the date of the final decree, although the executors charge themselves with the principal in their account.[88] Where a representative improperly withdraws funds from the estate, interest runs until repayment of the funds.[89] On the settlement of the accounts of an administrator after his death, he was properly charged with the face of a mortgage which he collected, and interest only to the time of the appraisal of the assets of the estate, the presumption being, in the absence of proof, that past-due debts of the estate were promptly collected, so that interest was not chargeable against him after the appraisal.[90]

Debt of representative. If the executor or administrator is indebted to the decedent, the rule that such debt is to be considered assets in his hands does not operate to stop the running of interest, but he is chargeable with interest until actual payment to the estate.[91] But where an administrator who is also a distributee satisfies a judgment against himself, he is not chargeable thereafter with interest on the amount of such judgment.[92]

[§ 508] 5. "Where the failure of a trustee in his duty is wilful, or characterized by bad faith, the highest rate of interest should be imposed. But where good faith and honest mistake concur, the rate of interest rests in a discretion, and permits the consideration of all the circumstances, which practically to a penalty.[98]

[§ 509] 6. Computation.[99] In charging an executor or administrator with interest on funds in his hands at a final settlement, his commission or recompense, or if he is a distributee his distributive share, should be deducted before a balance is struck and the interest is finally computed against him.[1] Where no account is rendered as to funds which should have been placed at interest, either as to their disposition or as to what was actually received, the representative ought to be charged, as nearly as the sum can be ascertained, with all he might have made or received in the honest exercise of due diligence and exertion, periodical computation being made less the proper deductions.[2] In taking the account, the usual practice is to treat funds received during the current year as unproductive until its close, and to regard all expenditures, including compensation and commissions in the course of the year, as made before the balance is struck, and on the balance so struck to calculate the interest in such way as to avoid compounding it.[3] Where the administrator at the time of his discharge was allowed by the ordinary to retain at four per cent interest a fund belonging to the estate which no person claimed, and he so held that fund until his death, many years thereafter, without adding to it the interest which had accrued, his own administrator was not entitled, before being charged with the interest on funds received by him, to have the total amount of such fund reduced by subtracting therefrom the principal of this unclaimed fund and the interest which had accrued thereon.[4] Where the personal representative has paid interest on the funds used by him, he will be allowed credit to the extent of the amount paid against the interest charged.[5]

The appraisement is presumed to be correct in determining the amount on which interest should be charged.[6]

Balance too small to invest. Where the annual balances are too small to have been put at interest, and the executor has received no credit or profit from them, interest will be charged only on the accumulated balances.[7]

Deductions after computing interest are sometimes made. Thus, where an executor's account showed that for more than thirty years there was in his hands a balance for which he should account to the legatees, less the expense of accounting, it was held that such expense should be deducted after and not before computing interest on the balance.[8]

[§ 510] 7. Compound Interest. If compound interest has been received by the representative, he must of course account for it;[9] but otherwise compound interest is rarely charged against an executor or administrator by way of penalty, unless something more appears than ordinary neglect of duty.[10] Where, however, there has been a willful show that substantial justice can be done to the cestui que trust, by allowing a less rate." King v. Talbot, supra [quot Matter of Downs, supra].

[a] Mode of treating interest.—When the personal representative is not in default, although there is a balance against him in favor of the estate, the interest on the balance is not carried into the account, but stands over until final settlement or until sufficient disbursements have been made to discharge it, after the balance of principal against him has been extinguished. But in restating the account, where the representative should have separated from his general account the accounts of payments to legatees and distributees, long before he made his settlement, he ought to settle under the rule of debtor and creditor, charging interest on money due, and applying payments to the liquidation of the interest first, and then of principal. If a balance should appear at any time in favor of the representative, the same rule is to be applied. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 54 W. Va. 621, 46 SE 589.

"We can see no just ground for charging the executor with compound interest, in the absence of any showing that he received compound interest on any of the moneys of the estate, or was guilty of some misappropriation of the funds or other property of the estate." In re Casner, 1 Cal. A. 145, 147, 81 P 991, 992.

[a] Only in case of gross delinquency can an executor be charged with compound interest. Thorn v. Garner, 42 Hun 507 [mod on other grounds 113 N. Y. 198, 21 NE 149].

[b] Mingling with individual funds.—(1) If an executor or administrator mingles the funds of the estate with his individual moneys, but does not apply them to his own use, he is chargeable with only simple interest. Berwick v. Halsey, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 18, 1 NYMonth LBul 8. (2) So also an executor has been held chargeable only with simple interest, although he mingled and loaned the funds of the estate with his own, where he did so in good faith, disclosing all the profits, and without fault or want of prudence, suffered some losses but claimed no deduction therefor and nothing for his services, when such interest exceeded what he actually received on the funds, and the funds had not been used in business, trade, or speculation. Perkins v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 348, 7 A 605. To same effect Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159, 28 P 558.

[c] Mere neglect to invest is not a sufficient ground for charging an administrator with compound interest. Lovett v. Thomas, 81 Va. 245.

[d] Production of new principal.—An administrator will be charged with compound interest only where a new principal has been produced by the settlement of the accounts, by a judgment, or by express agreement. In re Wilson, 1 Pa. Co. 509.

[e] Funds retained pursuant to testamentary directions.—Where an executor held property of the estate for fifteen years, and did not obtain interest thereon, but used the funds in his own business, the retention having been made in pursuance to an instruction in the will that distribution should not be made until all the heirs attained their majority, he was not chargeable with compound interest on the funds so retained. Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 676.

[f] Keeping on deposit.—The fact that an administrator kept the funds of the estate on deposit in a bank managed by his brother, who was surety on his bond, and that such funds were used by the bank as the funds of other depositors, does not show that he embezzled the funds, so as to justify charging him with compound interest. In re Sarment, 123 Cal. 331, 55 P 1015.

[g] Good faith and acquiescence.—Where the representative acted in good faith and the next of kin acquiesced in his acts for many years, he will not be charged compound interest. Matter of Kennedy, 9 NYS 552, 2 Conn. Surr. 216.

[h] Where a personal representative is entitled to the income of property of the estate for life, he is not chargeable with interest during the existence of the life estate, and only simple interest from the date of his death can be recovered against his estate. In such case the rule computing interest with annual rests has no application. Anderson v. Northrop, 44 Fla. 472, 33 S 419.

[i] Rents and profits of real estate.—The rule computing interest with annual rests has no application to an accounting by the representative to the heirs or devisees for the rents and profits of real estate, which belong to them and not to the estate. In such case he is liable only for simple interest. Anderson v. Northrop, 44 Fla. 472, 33 S 419.

"When a trust to invest has been grossly and wilfully neglected; where the funds have been used by the trustees in their own business, or profits made of which they give no account, interest is compounded as a punishment, or as a measure of damage for undisclosed profits and in place of them." Barney v. Saunders, 16 How. (U. S.) 535, 542, 14 L. ed. 1047.

[a] The theory on which compound interest is charged (1) is that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the executor or administrator will be presumed to have received profits to the amount from the use of the money, and not to punish him for the misconduct. Utica Ins. Co. v. Lynch, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 520; Atty.-Gen. v. Alford, 4 De G. M. & G. 843, 53 EngCh 659, 43 Reprint 737; Wightman v. Helliwell, 13 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 330. (2) The remedy of compounding interest is "a convenient and potent remedy to draw from delinquent trustees the actual or presumed profits derived from the use of trust funds." In re Ricker, 14 Mont. 153, 188, 35 P 960, 29 LRA 622. (3) "Interest is compounded as a punishment or as a measure of damage for undisclosed profits." Barney v. Saunders, 16 How. (U. S.) 535, 542, 14 L. ed. 1047. (4) "It is certain that the allowance of compound interest is often essential to carry into complete effect the principle of the court, that no profit, gain, or advantage shall be derived to the trustee from his use of the trust funds. All the gain must go to the cestui que trust. This is the true equity doctrine. It secures fidelity and removes temptation; and it is the ground of this allowance of annual rests, in the taking of the account, where the executor has used the property and does not disclose the proceeds." Schieffelin v. Stewart, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 620, 625, 7 AmD 507. (5) "The rule which makes an executor or other trustee chargeable with compound interest upon trust funds used by him in his own business is not adopted for the purpose of punishing him for any intentional wrongdoing in the use of such fund, but rather to carry into effect the principle enforced by courts of equity that the trustee shall not be permitted to make any profit from the unauthorized use of such funds. . . . The rule is intended to secure fidelity in the management on demand.[12] Delay in accounting for such a period as to amount to gross neglect of duty has been held to justify such a charge against the delinquent executor or administrator,[13] and a failure to invest in accordance with the directions of the will for the purpose of accumulation may also authorize a charge of compound interest against the executor.[14] In settling the account of a deceased personal representative compound interest will be charged only to the date of his death and simple interest thereafter, irrespective of the length of time during which the account was in process of settlement, if the delay was not due to his management of the estate.[15]

In computing compound interest it has been held proper to add to the principal interest which accrued during the time when simple interest only was chargeable, thus forming a new principal on which to start the calculation of compound interest.[16] Ordinarily the computation is made with annual rests,[17] but this is a matter to be determined according to the circumstances of each case,[18] and if the method of making annual rests is not adequate in any case, as where the amounts are large and easy of investment, rests will be made semiannually.[19]

[§ 511] H. Loans. Aside from a loan made under due authority as an investment,[20] an executor or administrator who lends to other persons the money or assets in his hands does so at his own individual risk and may be held personally liable as for conversion or to make good a resulting loss.[21] of trust estates, and where, as in this state, the conventional rate of interest exceeds the statutory rate, the executor should in such cases be charged with legal interest, compounded annually, in order to fully reach the profit realized by him from the use of the trust fund." Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 616, 35 P 345.

[b] "This rule is of modern growth and is applied more frequently in this country than in England." Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159, 172, 28 P 558.

[c] Compound interest not necessarily chargeable for mingling.—Perkins v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 348, 7 A 605.

[d] An administrator delaying the settlement of the estate for many years without excuse, and converting money of the estate to his own use, is properly charged with compound interest after the expiration of one year from his appointment, and is also liable for simple interest during the first year for the use of the money of the estate, although the widow's consent to his use authorized him to use it. In re McPhee, 156 Cal. 335, 104 P 455, AnnCas1913E 899 [den app 154 Cal. 385, 97 P 878].

[e] It is only on money received by the executor or administrator, and not on money for which he is liable to the estate, that he can be charged with compound interest. Sanderson v. Sanderson, 20 Fla. 292.

[f] It is proper to compute interest on installments of interest upon sums fraudulently or wrongfully taken from the funds of the estate. Porter v. Long, 136 Mich. 150, 98 NW 990, 4 AnnCas 177.

[g] Failure to account for securities.—Where an administrator failed properly to account for notes which came into his hands, and furnished no data for reaching a strictly accurate result, he should be charged with compound interest. Lommen v. Tobiason, 52 Iowa 665, 3 NW 715.

[h] On the other hand, in some jurisdictions, it has been doubted and even denied that compound interest is chargeable under any circumstances. (1) Thus in Pennsylvania it has been held that an executor or administrator cannot be charged with compound interest. Norris' App., 71 Pa. 106; Light's App., 24 Pa. 180; English v. Harvey, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 305; Matter of McCall, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 357. In South Carolina there has been considerable diversity of opinion as to charging compound interest. (2) In Black v. Blakely, 7 S. C. Eq. 1, the court refused to charge compound interest. (3) In Myers v. Myers, 7 S. C. Eq. 214, 16 AmD 648, Chancellor Thompson said that he never did allow compound interest and never would under any circumstances; (4) but this doctrine was disapproved on appeal in the same case and also in the case of Wright v. Wright, 7 S. C. Eq. 185, by Nott, J., who said that the rule in South Carolina was against allowing compound interest, but at the same time he declared that compound interest should be charged only in very special cases. (5) In Bowles v. Drayton, 1 S. C. Eq. 489, 1 AmD 689, Chancellor Rutledge allowed compound interest; (6) but this decision, as was afterward remarked by Judge Nott in Wright v. Wright, supra, was based on the express provision of the will. From the foregoing it will be observed that, while it has been said in some cases that compound interest should never be charged, the principle that such charge may be made under special circumstances is distinctly recognized.

[a] Deposit amounting to loan.—Where an administrator deposits estate funds in a bank, and receives a certificate payable to his order at a specified time after its date, with interest, such a deposit is evidence of a loan by him of such funds, and if the bank subsequently becomes insolvent he will be responsible for any loss resulting therefrom. Caruthers v. Caruthers, 99 Ill. A. 402.

[b] Adoption of contract by administrator de bonis non.—Where an administrator in chief makes an unauthorized loan of money belonging to the estate, if the administrator de bonis non accepts such loan, and seeks to hold the borrower as a trustee in invitum, he thereby elects to adopt the contract, and cannot subsequently treat the loan as a devastavit. Wilson v. Stevens, 129 Ala. 630, 29 S 678, 87 AmSR 86.

[c] The representative may be

But it has been held that the executor or administrator may in a proper case lend or advance to a distributee upon the security of his interest,[22] or in the exercise of due prudence lend to a failing debtor of the estate for the sake of getting security which could not be otherwise obtained.[23] Any impropriety in the making of a loan by an executor or administrator cannot, of course, relieve the borrower of his obligations to the lender with respect to the loan,[24] and for whatever the representative may receive from the borrower he is duly accountable to the estate,[25] and entitled to credit accordingly.[26] Where a testator before his death was a special partner of a certain person and by his will directed his executors to allow such person to retain as a loan to him the amount contributed by testator to the capital of the firm, such person could not be compelled to give security for the loan.[27]

[§ 512] I. Gifts. The executor or administrator has no right to give away any assets even though of trifling value, nor will the law give effect to such transfer.[28]

[§ 513] J. Expenditures—1. In General. An executor or administrator is authorized to use the funds of the estate for expenditures necessary to its proper administration,[29] and is entitled to credit in his accounts for expenses necessarily and properly incurred by him in good faith, in transacting with reasonable care and diligence the business of his trust, upon due proof of the particular items of expense claimed.[30] The practical situation is usually that the executor or administrator makes himself liable de bonis propriis to others by incurring expense, but that he may reimburse himself under appropriate circumstances out of the assets of the estate.[31]

[§ 514] 2. Allowance a Question for Court. The allowance or disallowance of expenditures is a ques-

Interest on funds of estate generally see supra §§ 495–510.

[d] Indemnity against loss sufficient.—Where the executor in good faith, and in the belief that the security was adequate, loaned money thereon to the proctor of the estate, he should be charged only by requiring an indemnity against loss, and should not be personally charged with the deficiency in the security. The widow, owning a part of the estate and entitled to a half of what was left after the payment of debts, objected to the sale. The administrator did not sell, and continued to manage the property, and incurred necessary expenses for so doing. He subsequently sold the estate to the widow for one thousand two hundred dollars. "Primarily, an executor, personally, and not the estate, is liable for all contracts made by him in the execution of his trust. Notwith-

tion of law for the court and not a question of fact for the jury.[32] Where the statute provides for a determination by the probate court of the amount of expenditures, the court cannot dismiss a petition to pay a certain sum without fixing a reasonable amount which may be paid.[33]

Review of discretion. It is doubtful whether the action of the court of probate jurisdiction in refusing to give an administrator authority to expend money of the estate which the law and his duties do not require him to expend is reviewable at all in an appellate court, and certainly it cannot be reviewed except for an abuse of discretion.[34]

[§ 515] 3. Sanction of Court. The representative is always entitled to credit for expenditures made by the order of or with the approval and sanction of the court,[35] even though the court was indiscreet in making the order pursuant to which he acted;[36] but the fact that the representative has expended money upon the faith of an order of the court making an allowance for certain expenses does not preclude the court from annulling such order upon evidence that the petition upon which it was made did not fully and truly state the facts.[37]

Previous sanction of the court is not necessary, however, and expenses properly incurred without such sanction may be allowed.[38]

[§ 516] 4. Necessity of Actual Payment. Credit for an administration expense should not as a rule be allowed to the executor or administrator on his accounting in court, until or unless the amount has been actually paid,[39] and where partial payment only has been made, credit will be allowed as to that part only.[40] There are, however, a few cases in which a contrary opinion has been asserted,[41] and it has been held that an administrator is entitled to have the amount of his attorney's fee determined before he has paid him anything.[42]

[§ 517] 5. Improper or Unnecessary Expenditures. As a general rule the representative will not be allowed credit for improper or unnecessary payments or expenditures made by him,[43] especially in the case of needless and extravagant outlays over a small and simple estate,[44] and although disbursements which ultimately prove to have been unnecessary may be sometimes allowed if made in good faith and under a reasonable belief of their necessity,[45] the representative must show some just explanation before he can legally claim their allowance.[46]

[§ 518] 6. Expenses Caused by Misconduct or Unauthorized Acts.[47] Positive misconduct on the part of the representative bars any claim by him against the estate for reimbursement of his expenses caused thereby,[48] nor will he be allowed credit for expenditures which became necessary by reason of his own negligence[49] or were made in the course of or resulted from acts done by him standing this rule, the necessary expenses of administering an estate may be regarded as a charge upon, although not a debt against the estate, and when the expenses incurred by an executor are by the court found to be necessary and proper in the administration of the estate, they are payable from the estate." This was a question primarily for the court to settle, and its order of settlement in that respect will not be reviewed, unless there is in the record, no ground upon which it can be supported. It cannot be said that that appears here. The court found that the payment was made in good faith, under circumstances which made it advantageous and beneficial for the estate to have made the payment, and has approved it, and, we think, under the circumstances shown, the action was right." [a] Traveling expenses of clergyman.—Where no clergyman of the denomination to which decedent belonged lived in the immediate neighborhood, and one is brought from another place, the traveling expenses of such clergyman paid by the administrator will be properly allowed as a credit in the administrator's account. Nolde's Est., 27 Pa. Super. 413 [aff 21 LancLRev 59].

[b] Transportation of the body (1) of decedent from the place of death to a proper place of burial is an expense which should be allowed. Harding's Est., 7 Pa. Dist. 679, 21 Pa. Co. 641 ("There does not, however, seem to be any question but that the expense of transporting the body and the friends who accompany it to the place of interment comes under this head [funeral expenses], whether the same is by carriage to some convenient cemetery or by railroad or boat to one some distance away"). (2) This is true although the transportation is for a long distance. Sullivan v. Horner, 41 N. J. Eq. 299, 7 A 411 (from Texas to New Jersey); In re Parry, 188 Pa. 38, 40, 41 A 384, 68 AmSR 850 ("Where the estate is ample, as here, there is as much reason for subjecting it to reasonable charges for the embalming and transportation of a body from India to the cemetery at Philadelphia as from a dwelling on Walnut street to the same place"); Carpenter's Est., 16 Phila. [c] The expenses of a wake, if not unreasonable, have been held to constitute a proper item of funeral charges. Johnson's Est., 8 Pa. Co. 1. Contra White's Est., 13 Phila. (Pa.) 287.

[d] Parade.—A donation of two hundred and fifty dollars, made by an executor to his testator's commandery for parading at the funeral, is not a proper charge against the estate, where it does not appear that the commandery required the payment of that sum or any other as a condition of their participation in the funeral. In re Reynolds, 124 N. Y. 388, 26 NE 954.

[e] Flowers on grave.—The administrator is not entitled to credit for sums expended for flowers to place upon the grave of decedent. Matter of Schroeder, 113 App. Div. 204, 99 NYS 176 [aff 186 N. Y. 537 mem, 78 NE 1112 mem].

[f] Carfare; time; services.—An administrator will not be allowed, on the settlement of his account, for money paid out for car or coach fare for himself and wife, or for a sister and her husband, to attend the funeral of a brother; nor will the administrator be allowed pay for his time or services in attending such funeral. Lund v. Lund, 41 N. H. 355.

[g] Changing place of burial.—An allowance to an administratrix, who was the second wife of decedent, for expenses incurred in removing the body of decedent from one cemetery to another has been set aside, where it was shown that the place where decedent was first interred was a suitable one, selected by him prior to his death, was the place where his children desired that he should be interred, was in the same cemetery in which his first wife was buried, and was nearer to his home than the place chosen by the second wife. [§ 522] (2) Tombstones and Monuments. Credit should be allowed for a reasonable expenditure[62] for a tombstone or monument for decedent,[63] and this notwithstanding the objection of some of the legatees and next of kin, where the expenditure has been approved by the majority of those beneficially interested.[64] A moderate expenditure for a tombstone is sometimes allowed, even though the estate is insolvent,[65] although there is also authority for the view that an allowance is improper under such circumstances.[66] Even though the statute authorizes the probate court to allow an administrator any reasonable sum for a tombstone for decedent, the court is without jurisdiction, in advance of the settlement of the estate, to entertain an application to fix a sum for that purpose and order the administrator, if the monument is not procured by the widow or next of kin, to erect such monument and charge the expense to the estate.[67]

Family mausoleum. It is proper to deny the petition of an administrator for leave to expend funds of the estate in the erection of a mausoleum in honor of the family of which decedent was a member, on the family burial plot, far removed from decedent's grave.[68]

[§ 523] (3) Burial Lots. The cost of a suitable burial lot in which to inter the decedent should be allowed,[69] and it has been held that an administratrix should be allowed the sum paid for a grave for decedent even though the lot was taken in her own name personally.[70]

The cost of improving and enclosing a burial lot should not, it has been held, be allowed where objection thereto is made.[71] But it has also been held that, where the will directs the executors to erect and maintain a fence around a cemetery and charges all expenses directed by it upon lands devised, the executors can maintain a suit in equity against the devisees of the land or their assigns for the expenses of erecting such fence.[72]

A payment for perpetual care of the burial lot is sometimes authorized by statute.[73]

Provision by decedent in his lifetime. An executrix cannot be allowed the expense of procuring a burial lot and monument, where testator in his lifetime provided one himself.[74]

[§ 524] (4) Mourning Apparel for Family. It has been held that the executor or administrator is entitled to a moderate allowance for moneys which he has properly expended in obtaining suitable mourning apparel for the widow and children of decedent,[75] even though the estate is insolvent,[76] but in other cases this has been denied.[77]

[§ 525] (5) Amount of Expenditure. The expenditure for funeral expenses, tombstones, and the like must be reasonable in amount, taking into consideration the value of the estate left by the decedent, his solvency or insolvency, and his station in life;[78] and as there is more time for circumspection and prudence in selecting a tombstone or

[b] Keeping tomb in repair.—A statute allowing an executor of a solvent estate to erect a monument at the testator's grave at the expense of the estate includes a power of making reasonably necessary repairs on the tomb of the deceased during the time of the administration, although the cost thereof exceeds the sum set apart by decedent's will for the maintenance of the monument. even perhaps a permanent burial lot than with reference to the immediate funeral or interment, consultation in regard to such matters with the family of decedent, in addition to a consideration of the actual condition of the estate, is prudent and desirable.[79] An executor is of course to be allowed expenditures for the funeral, a monument, or similar expenses which are expressly authorized by the will.[80] A testamentary direction authorizing the executors to expend not more than a fixed sum has the effect of prohibiting the expenditure of a greater sum,[81] but the executor's duty does not require him to expend the entire sum mentioned.[82] Where the testator sets apart a specified sum for funeral expenses and proper interment of his remains and a suitable monument to his memory, etc., he gives to the executors discretion in the selection of the monument, its form and style, with reference to the amount set apart for the purpose, and the full amount of the fund, or such part as the executors deem fit, may be expended in the erection of a monument.[83]

Wash.—In re Murphy, 30 Wash. 9, 70 P 109.

[a] Support of infant.—Where a widow acted as executrix of her husband's will, which was afterward set aside, expenditures made by her for the education and support of her minor son were matters wholly between her and the son, and not items in the accounting between her and the administrator. Read v. Franklin, (Tenn. Ch. A.) 60 SW 215.

[b] Care and burial of adult child.—An administrator paying doctors' bills and funeral expenses of an adult child of intestate cannot have an allowance therefor out of the estate, but only a charge on the distributive share of the child, although the child was an invalid and lived with intestate's family. In re Murphy, 30 Wash. 9, 70 P 109.

[c] Funeral expenses.—An allowance to executors of credit for the funeral expenses of one of the devisees under the will was improper, where there was no provision in the will authorizing such payment. Judson v. Bennett, 233 Mo. 607, 136 SW 681.

[d] Where there is protracted litigation between the next of kin living outside the state and a widow appointed administratrix, during which the widow, although confined by a marriage settlement to a cash provision in lieu of widow's rights, occupied the homestead, expenditures for minor housekeeping expenses may be allowed. [a] Illustration. — Payments of cash to a minor legatee for whose support there is ample provision, the purpose of which is not explained, and for which no receipts are shown, are not allowable to the executor; but he is entitled to credit for a payment made to a minor legatee to

to the widow and children.[86] There is, however, on the other hand, considerable authority for the view that the personal representative is entitled to credit for expenditures for the support, maintenance, and education of persons beneficially interested in the estate,[87] and it is obvious that credit should be allowed for such expenditures where they are made under order of court or pursuant to statute or directions in the will.[88] Whatever may be the right of the representative in his general account, he is unquestionably entitled to have expenditures properly made by him for the benefit of a particular legatee or distributee allowed as credits on the share of such beneficiary when a settlement with him is made.[89]

[§ 527] d. Payment of Decedent's Debts.[90] An executor or administrator is of course entitled to credit for debts of the decedent which he has paid,[91] or for the amount paid out in settling a bona fide claim against the estate, whereby a saving has been effected,[92] but he cannot be allowed for an illegal claim which he paid to avoid family disgrace;[93] and where the assets are insufficient to pay all the demands of one class, and such demands must, under the statute, be paid proportionately, a representative who pays on any one claim more than its just proportion, without an order of court, must make good to the estate the excessive payment.[94]

[§ 528] e. Repairs and Improvements. With regard to personal property, an executor or administrator may be properly credited with amounts necessarily expended for repairs while it was in his custody.[95] With respect to real estate, however, the personal representative is not, as a rule, entitled to the immediate possession and control thereof,[96] and hence he is not usually entitled to credit for amounts expended in repairs or improvements of such property.[97] Where, however, he is duly invested with the control or management of such property, he may be allowed credit for what he has

[d] Under exceptional circumstances a widow and administratrix who acted in perfect good faith in applying the personalty for repairs to and other expenditures for the benefit of the realty, in order to protect it for herself and her children, of whom she was guardian and who expended in good faith in necessary repairs,[98] unless he has personally received benefits from such control and possession commensurate with the amounts expended,[99] although expenditures and outlays in improvements are less favored, especially where the corresponding enhancement in value seems remote and uncertain, or the personal property is sacrificed for the benefit of the realty.[1] However, an executor is of course protected in carrying out the provisions of the will with reference to the improvement of the testator's real estate,[2] and, without considering whether an administrator had authority to collect rents, it has been held that administrators who have charged themselves with the rents are entitled to a credit for repairs.[3] So also an executor may be allowed for improvements which the court would have ordered him to make, although they were actually made without an order of court,[4] and the concurrence of heirs may justify expenditures for improvements.[5] It has been held that an administrator who is also a tenant in common as a distributee will be allowed credit not for the cost of improvements put by him on the land, but for the value of such improvements to the premises,[6] and where an administrator who has undertaken the management of realty is charged with rents, he is entitled to offset against such charge the cost of necessary improvements.[7]

Where the decedent made contracts in his lifetime for repairs or improvements, the personal representative is entitled to credit for payments made thereon.[8]

[§ 529] f. Services.[9] An executor or administrator should be allowed credit for amounts paid for the services of agents, clerks, assistants, bookkeepers, and other persons employed by him to assist him in the performance of his duties, where the employment of such persons is reasonably necessary and the employment is bona fide for the benefit of the estate;[10] but the estate cannot be charged for services which the representative should have performed himself and for which his general recompense ought to be ample remuneration, and which he procured to be performed by others for his own

[d] Stenographer. — On proceedings for the settlement of an executor's account, it was proper to allow compensation to a stenographer. Matter of Arnton, 106 App. Div. 326, 94 NYS 471.

[e] Broker's commissions (1) for negotiating sales of property of the estate are usually allowed. Brown v. Brown, 72 N. J. (2) The allowance must be made to the executor and not to the broker, and hence the court cannot fix such compensation without a request by the executor. Hickman-Coleman Co. v. Leggett, 10 Cal. A. 29, 100 P 1072. (3) It is within the discretion of the court to refuse such an allowance. Jones v. Gilliam, (Tex. Civ. A.) 199 SW 694.

[g] Where the employment of an accountant was suggested by testator in his will on an accounting by the executor, it was not error to allow an amount paid to an accountant employed by the executor. Matter of Arnton, 106 App. Div. 326, 94 NYS 471.

[h] The allowance of such charges is the exception and not the rule, and when they are brought forward it is the duty of the court to scrutinize them with a jealous and watchful eye. O'Neill v. Donnell, 9 Ala. 734. See also Overman v. Lanier, 157 N. C. 544, 73 SE 192, 194; Weiss v. Dill, 3 Myl. & K. 26, 10 EngCh 26, 40 Reprint 10 (allowance made only under very special circumstances).

[i] Estoppel to object. — Where services not obviously alien to the administration have been rendered at the special request and advice of a person interested in the estate, such person is estopped from objecting to the allowance of a just compensation for them in the settlement of the administrator's account. Wendell v. French, 19 N. H. 205.

[j] Discretion of court. — The question whether an administrator is entitled to employ a bookkeeper depends on the circumstances of the estate and should be left to the discretion of the court. In re More, 121 Cal. 609, 54 P 97.

"Nor should it require argument that attorney's fees in proper cases are legitimate expenses of administration. . . . It was proper that the expenses thus incurred, including the reasonable fees of the attorneys for the estate, should be paid, even though it results in a reduction of the dividend apportioned among the creditors." [a] Rule applies to public administrator.—Harris' Succ., 29 La. Ann. 743.

[b] An administrator who was removed on account of his infancy at the time of appointment, after the commencement of a suit against him, has been allowed his costs out of the estate. Carow v. Mowatt, 2 Edw. (N. Y.) 57.

[c] Witness' fees paid by the administratrix in connection with a hearing had before the court of probate to determine a matter of heirship should be allowed to her in her final accounting, especially where the payment antedated the application for allowance by about four years and no effort had been made by the objecting parties to fix its status. Mayer v. Schneider, 122 Ill. A. 48.

[e] Where an executor defends an ejectment suit, and thereby saves property for the creditors and legatees of the estate, he will be entitled to counsel fees not only for services of counsel in settling the estate, but also for services in the ejectment suit. Evans' Est., 24 Pa. Super. 151.

[f] Where suits at law were threatened against an executor growing out of certain assignment proceedings in which testator, as assignee, had continued the business in another state without judicial authority, and had advanced considerable of his own money to the furtherance of such business, it was the executor's duty to employ counsel to restrict such liability to the lowest point, for which service the executor was entitled to an allowance for fees. In re Wiley, (N. J. Prerog.) 65 A 212.

[g] In what account allowance to be made.—Where an executor under a will, the probate of which was reversed, became liable for fees of counsel engaged to prosecute an appeal, and afterward, on being appointed administrator, actually paid such counsel fees, he was not entitled to include the fees in his account as administrator, and receive reimbursement from the estate, without first having the item of the fees allowed in his account as executor. Matter of Blair, 67 App. Div. 116, 73 NYS 675 [aff 34 Misc. 444, 69 NYS 1013].

[h] Judgment for costs not directing payment from estate.—Under the statute providing that an administrator shall have allowed all judgments for costs rendered against him which the court shall direct to be paid out of the estate, unless the action in which the costs were taxed was prosecuted or resisted without just cause, where in proceedings for which he undertook, but he is entitled thereto regardless of whether he succeeds or fails,[19] provided the litigation relates to property of, or claims in favor of or against, the estate,[20] was undertaken and conducted in good faith,[21] and with reasonable prudence,[22] for the benefit of the estate,[23] and was reasonably necessary,[24] either because the rights concerned were complicated and conflicting,[25] or because the questions involved in the dispute were such that there might reasonably be an honest and sincere difference of opinion as to the proper solution thereof.[26]

The circumstances of each particular case govern in determining whether or not an allowance should be made.[27]

[§ 531] (2) Personal Liability of Representative. As has been seen the estate is not primarily liable for legal services rendered for the benefit of the estate at the request of the personal representative, but the representative is personally liable with the right of reimbursement for reasonable expenditures.[28] The fact that attorneys representing the personal representative also represented certain creditors and agreed to release the personal representative from all liability for their services, except as to such sum as the court might thereafter allow against the estate on their account does not, however, constitute a reason for disallowing the claim for such services.[29] So also executors or administrators, as a rule, are individually responsible for costs recovered against them, but are allowed to be reimbursed from the estate;[30] but they are sometimes relieved by statute from individual liability for costs.[31]

[§ 532] (3) Showing Necessary for Allowance. In order that a representative may be allowed for attorney's fees he must show that services were actually rendered[32] and what such services the settlement of the account of an administrator, it appeared that two judgments for costs were rendered in his favor and two against him, but it did not appear that they were directed to be paid out of the estate, none of the judgments for costs could be allowed to the administrator. But compare Bertrand's Succ., 127 La. 857, 54 S 127 (compensation should not be allowed an attorney for the administrator when his services as a whole have been detrimental to the succession).

"To hold otherwise would be to place the estates of deceased persons at a great and unnecessary disadvantage, since reputable lawyers would not care to accept employment that would put them in the position of an insurer of their client's lawsuits." Dooley v. Welch, 172 Mo. A. 528, 536, 158 SW 457.

[a] Where an administrator is substituted as a party defendant in a suit pending against decedent at his death, and the administrator employs competent counsel and acts on their advice, and seeks to preserve the estate for the benefit of all the creditors, he cannot be charged with the costs and expenses of defending the suit, although it may have ultimately gone against him. Nolde's Est., 27 Pa. Super. 413.

[b] Where effect is to throw expense on successful party.—On the final account of a special administrator of a testator, he claimed credits for fees in a suit brought by him against an heir for a partnership accounting, in which suit the administrator was defeated. The heir in question had obtained a decree enforcing a lien on all real estate descending to the only other heir; and he contended that the items of the account should not be allowed, because the amount of the lien being greater than the property devised to the other heir, an allowance of the items would in effect compel him to pay the whole of the items. It was held, however, that this contention was of no merit. Bruning v. Golden, 159 Ind. 199, 64 NE 657.

Matter of Hoffman, 62 Misc. 600, 601, 115 NYS 984, 989 (an administrator, after a judgment in his favor had been reversed, should have taken his defeat at the third trial as final, in view of the practice of appellate courts not to keep on ordering new trials against repeated verdicts, and hence the administrator was not entitled to the costs of litigation after the third trial).

were[33] that the services were necessary,[34] and that the fees or charges have been actually paid.[35]

[§ 533] (4) Approval of Court. It is not necessary that attorney's fees paid by an executor or administrator should have been fixed or approved by the court before payment in order to entitle him to credit therefor;[36] but aside from a sanction previously given, the probate court may, in its just discretion, allow a credit for professional services reasonably and honestly employed.[37] Indeed it has been held that a disbursement made by the representative to an attorney to protect the estate in litigation pursuant to authority granted by the court of probate, should, on final accounting, be allowed, although the reviewing tribunal might not have authorized the disbursement had its judgment been invoked in the first instance.[38] Nevertheless an administrator who pays attorney's fees without an order of court does so at his own risk,[39] and in a case where an executor did not apply to the county court for advice in the management of the estate, and for more than eight years made no report of his dealings, although required by statute to account semi-annually, it was held that the court properly denied him any attorney's fees.[40]

[§ 534] (5) Consent of Persons Beneficially Interested. The consent or instance of the heirs, distributees, or others beneficially interested in the estate may be adduced to justify expenses incurred by the personal representative in engaging counsel or pursuing a litigation.[41]

[§ 535] (6) Employment by Cofiduciaries. For coexecutors or coadministrators separate counsel are not usually allowed;[42] but circumstances may arise to justify a separate employment, if the cost to the estate is not duplicated thereby.[43] An attorney for one of two executors, who collected money belonging to the estate, is entitled thereto, as against the coexecutor, where he had performed services for the estate, on the request of one of the executors, in excess of the amount collected, and had claimed a lien on the sum collected, and thereafter the executor at whose request he had rendered his services agreed that he should retain it and apply it on account of such services.[44]

[§ 536] (7) Charges in Particular Matters—(a) Probate or Contest of Will. Although the cases are not all in accord, the weight of authority supports the view that executors are entitled to be allowed for the services of an attorney to assist in obtaining the probate of the will,[45] that an allowance for such expenses may also be made to the

But compare Leavenworth v. Marshall, 19 Conn. 408 (where an appeal from a decree of probate respects rights and claims contested between heirs, devisees, and legatees, the expense is to be defrayed by the parties in interest).

[a] Illustration.—A caveat having been filed to a will, the executor retained counsel to defend it. Verdict was rendered for the caveatees, and on an appeal the rulings were affirmed, and judgment in the orphans' court was entered accordingly. Thereafter a petition was filed in the orphans' court for new issues to be sent to a court of law for trial. The issues were refused, and on appeal the issues were substantially the same as on the prior appeal, and the order refusing them was affirmed. Letters, however, were not granted until after the second appeal was decided. It was held that for the purpose of defending the will its admission to probate without the grant of letters was sufficient, and hence the executor was entitled to an allowance for counsel fees in the litigation growing out of the second set of issues prayed by the caveators. [h] Defense not undertaken in fiduciary capacity.—Where a deputy register of wills took the affidavit of the subscribing witness to the will, but nothing more was done in the matter, and no order adjudging the writing to be the last will of the testatrix was ever filed, and no letters testamentary were ever granted, and after the affidavits had been taken a caveat was interposed, the residuary legatee, who was also named as executrix, and who was made defendant in caveat proceedings, was not defending the will in her capacity as executrix, and had no claim to be reimbursed out of the estate for the attorney's fee she may have con-

the will or the particular provision attacked is invalid,[48] and that a person named as executor in a will which has been admitted to probate is entitled to be reimbursed his counsel fees and expenses in opposing the probate of another paper subsequently propounded as a will,[49] even though the latter paper is established as the will and admitted to probate.[50] Expenses incurred by an executor in unsuccessfully assailing the will by raising an issue of ademption are not a proper expenditure by him as executor, and in the absence of evidence of an express agreement on the part of the legatees to reimburse him for the costs, the estate is not liable therefor.[51] It has been held that an administrator who opposes the probate of a paper offered as the last will of the decedent cannot, although contesting honestly, be allowed reimbursement for the costs, expenses, and counsel fees for which he has made himself liable, in case the will becomes established,[52] but there is also authority for the contrary view,[53] and an administrator has been held entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred in setting aside an alleged will.[54]

[§ 537] (b) Procuring Appointment or Qualification. While it has been held that an executor or administrator is entitled to reimbursement for the just and reasonable expenses incurred in procuring his appointment or qualification in the probate court,[55] there is also considerable authority for the view that such an allowance should not be made,[56] and a denial of such an allowance is unquestionably proper where the appointment was improperly procured by falsely representing that the appointee was entitled to administer.[57]

[§ 538] (c) Collection and Protection of Assets. The representative is entitled to attorney's fees paid in an action necessary to collect debts or assets of the estate,[58] and counsel fees and costs incurred in asserting or defending title to assets are properly allowed.[59]

[§ 539] (d) Resisting Claims against Estate. An executor or administrator is entitled to an allowance of counsel fees and other expenses incurred in resisting claims against the estate,[60] and in any particular case his right is determined by whether or not he acted in good faith and with reasonable prudence, rather than by his success or failure in the litigation.[61]

But compare Royer's App., 13 Pa. 569 (an executor is not entitled to charge his account with the costs incurred in an unsuccessful attempt to uphold a will, the validity of which is contested, unless the litigation is for the benefit of the estate, or for the interests of those eventually found to be entitled to the fund).

[a] Case settled before trial.—The attorney's fees of an executor in a contested will case, which was amicably settled without trial, are not a proper subject of charge against the estate, when the settlement did not distribute the testator's property in accordance with the provisions of the will. [§ 540] (e) Procuring Direction of Court. Executors and administrators may take the opinion of the court or procure its advice, aid, protection, or sanction at the expense of the estate, in cases where their rights and duties are left in reasonable doubt; and in similar proceedings commenced by others to which they are made parties their reasonable counsel fees and expenses will be allowed.[62] Nevertheless full reimbursement may be denied where a judicial direction is sought needlessly or in bad faith or with needless accumulation of expense.[63]

[§ 541] (f) Miscellaneous Matters. An executor or administrator is not entitled to credit in his account for counsel fees paid by him for services rendered in contesting a proper charge against him;[64] but he is entitled to credit for reasonable counsel fees and other expenses incurred in resisting improper charges,[65] opposition to his proper official acts,[66] attacks upon his accounts,[67] or, it has been held, an attempt to remove him.[68] The representative may be allowed for his counsel fees and costs in probate proceedings in the line of his duty,[69] an appeal justly taken,[70] continuing in good faith a suit begun by his decedent,[71] foreclosing a mortgage,[72] or enforcing notes or contracts running to himself for the benefit of the estate,[73] or in a suit properly brought by an administrator de bonis non for a settlement of the estate,[74] or criminal proceedings against an impostor or one personating an heir, when proper for the protection of the estate.[75] Expenses incurred in preparation for expected litigation will be allowed, although the dispute results in a compromise,[76] as will also the costs of setting aside a sale of decedent's real estate where a subsequent sale realizes more than the first.[77] Where an executrix's contention that the will gave her, as life tenant, the right to dispose of the principal as far as she deemed necessary for her support, has been sustained after litigation, she may charge her reasonable cost of the litigation against the principal.[78] Where the nominated executor in good faith appeals from an order of the court rejecting the will, it is proper for him to bring a suit in equity to prevent a threatened distribution of the estate by the administrator, and he is entitled to be reimbursed for the costs thereof, although he does not succeed on his appeal.[79] Reasonable and necessary traveling expenses of the attorney have also been allowed.[80] The representative should not be allowed for counsel fees and costs in proceedings undertaken merely to vindicate the good name of the decedent,[81] litigation with reference to real estate not in his charge,[82] resisting payment of a bill for reasonable funeral expenses,[83] or attempting to enforce a contract by which the widow agrees to take a child's share in lieu of dower, the contract having been set aside as fraudulent.[84] No allowance should be made for a payment merely as a retainer,[85] for attendance of counsel at sales of land by the executor when no necessity therefor is shown,[86] or for the services of an attorney in the management of the estate while the representative was enjoined from transacting the business of the estate,[87] or in procuring evidence in actions brought against the estate.[88] The expense incurred in a controversy between executors, one opposing the qualification of the others, is not a proper charge against the estate,[89] nor will a bill for attorney's services in endeavoring unsuccessfully to remove a coexecutor be allowed out of the estate.[90] Where an executor appeals from an order of the probate court making an allowance for the support of a widow, and brings error to an order dismissing the appeal, he is liable personally for the costs in both courts.[91] The counsel fees and expenses of an executor in attending a reference for distribution when there was a contest with the legatees have been disallowed.[92] An executor has been allowed credit for money expended in procuring the arrest, and conducting the prosecution, of a person who killed decedent,[93] although the weight of authority is against such an allowance.[94]

expenditures must be reasonable,[95] and what is a reasonable amount in any particular case is a matter resting within the discretion of the court,[96] which should not be governed absolutely by the opinion of professional men, the charge made by the counsel, or the contract of employment, but should exercise its own fair judgment and fix the amount allowable with reference to the labor, skill, and care required, the value of the estate, the advantages gained or sought by the services or litigation, and the good faith and reasonable prudence shown by the representative who claims the allowance.[97] Beyond this no general rule can be laid down, but reference is made in the notes to a number of illustrative cases in which particular amounts have been held reasonable,[98] inadequate,[99] or excessive.[1]

fee, the allowance will be made more liberal because of that fact.[2]

The number of attorneys employed is not a determining factor in fixing the fee to be allowed,[3] and where more counsel than were necessary have been employed, the court may properly refuse to allow all the fees paid.[4]

A statute fixing the amount to be allowed merely fixes the maximum, and the representative is not entitled to the full amount permitted by the statute where the actual fees incurred and paid are less.[5]

Apportionment of fees. On an issue as to the amount allowable to an administrator out of trust funds for the payment of attorney's fees, the court was not required to pass on the merits of the respective claims of the attorneys for services, nor to apportion the amount awarded.[6]

Fees retained by attorney from amount collected by him. In a case where an executor employed a firm of attorneys in another state to procure funds of the decedent on deposit in that state, and the attorneys, after securing the funds, remitted the same to the executor less an excessive charge for their services, and the executor sought to recover a part of such charge from the attorneys, but was unsuccessful, mainly because of the pecuniary irresponsibility of the attorneys, it was held that the executor was entitled to credit for the entire fee.[7]

[§ 543] (9) When Allowance Refused—(a) In General. The representative will not be allowed credit where the services were not for the benefit of the estate,[8] where the advice of counsel was taken and inexcusably disregarded,[9] where the representative exceeded his powers in acting in reference to the matter as to which the fees are claimed,[10] or where the charges paid or incurred by the personal representative were illegal or grossly excessive.[11] So also an allowance of credit may properly be refused where the litigation was improper,[12] unnecessary,[13] or unnecessarily protracted,[14] where a proceeding instituted by the representative has been allowed to fail for lack of reasonable diligence in prosecuting it[15] or has been abandoned without good reason,[16] where the action should not have been brought by the representative in his fiduciary capacity,[17] where the representative's contentions were groundless,[18] or where it was understood that the fees and costs would be paid elsewhere and not by the estate.[19] A charge for an attorney's services in attempting to rectify his own neglect in failing to interpose a proper plea has been disallowed.[20] A claim by an administrator for expenses incurred in collecting a claim due the estate must be rejected, in the absence of a showing that the services were extraordinary,[21] and an administrator cannot charge the estate with expenses incurred in advising with counsel with respect to interests and demands antagonistic to the claims of the heirs, when he knows that such counsel is representing the antagonistic interests.[22] Where an executor made no effort to open an assessment of collateral inheritance taxes in another state until the time for appealing therefrom had elapsed, when he made such application in order to discharge himself from liability, the estate was not chargeable with his attorney's fees in that behalf.[23] Where an administratrix so conducted the estate as to justify disallowing any claim by her for commissions, it was improper to allow her counsel fees.[24]

That negligence, if it existed, consisted in the want of care on the part of the executor in the selection of the Baltimore attorneys and the failure to contract in advance touching their charges. . . . They were licensed attorneys regularly engaged in the practice of law in Baltimore and as such were represented to the public as worthy of its confidence, and as practicing attorneys they were necessarily amenable to the courts of Maryland for their professional conduct. There is no evidence of bad faith in their employment, nor was their fee shared or agreed to be shared with either the executor or his New Jersey proctor. The failure of the executor to make inquiries touching their integrity or responsibility was an honest error of judgment in so far as it was error. Nor is it doubted that an honest effort has since been made by the executor to recover from these attorneys the amount of their excessive charge. In these circumstances I am unable to believe that the loss can be properly charged to the executor").

the benefit of persons whose interests are antagonistic to the estate is not entitled to recover against the estate for such advances.[28]

[§ 546] (d) Personal Benefit of Representative. An executor or administrator cannot be allowed, as against the estate, the costs and expenses of litigation or the employment of counsel for his own individual benefit.[29] Such is the rule where the fiduciary has a special interest as legatee, devisee, heir, or distributee, to protect which he contests against others,[30] and to some extent the same rule applies to the asserting of his personal claims in the probate court for allowance against the estate, where he was reasonably opposed by others and failed of success.[31] So also the expense incurred by an executor in a suit against him for the recovery of real estate in his possession in his capacity as an individual is not an expenditure required by him as executor, and the estate is not liable therefor,[32] and where an administrator paid claims against his intestate's estate and took assignments thereof in the name of another for his benefit, but it did not appear that the administrator's private funds were used for such purpose, the estate was not interested in the classification of such claims, and hence the cost of litigation carried on by the administrator with reference to such classification, apparently in his individual interest, should be paid by him personally, and not from the funds of the estate.[33] Neither can a decedent's estate be charged with the expenses of the executor in the employment of counsel to oppose a motion by the executrix to compel him to deliver to her personal property of the estate in his hands on which he claimed commissions.[34] But the mere fact that an executor or administrator is beneficially interested in the estate is not sufficient to defeat his right to an allowance for expenses incurred in defending against claims asserted against the estate.[35] Apportionment of such costs and expenses as between representative

"To hold otherwise would simply be to enable him by reason of his position as executor to subject the whole estate to such expenses as were incurred by him in litigation defended by him for his own sole benefit as a devisee and legatee under the assailed will. It cannot properly be held, that it was necessary for him as executor to defend such litigation. While he undoubtedly had the legal right under our statute to defend the will in his capacity as executor (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1299, 1312; In re Hite, 155 Cal. 448, 101 P 448), if such defense was solely for his own benefit as a devisee and legatee and could not operate beneficially as to any other person interested in the estate, he must bear the costs and charges of maintaining it. The general reasoning in support of our conclusion has been so recently stated in Hite's Est., supra, that it is unnecessary to discuss the question further. If there be anything in In re Riviere, 8 Cal. A. 773, 98 P 46, that is in conflict with what is said in Hite's Est., supra, the latter case must of course control. But, as we understand Estate of Riviere, supra, the point decided by the learned District Court of Appeal was simply that an attorney's fee may, under some circumstances, be allowed an executor for service rendered by attorneys employed by him in resisting a contest before probate, where the contest is unsuccessful, and the will is finally admitted to probate. This we are not disposed to dispute. The circumstances may well be such as to make such an allowance entirely equitable as to all persons interested in the estate. But if expressions in that case can reasonably be construed as going further than this, they cannot be considered as authority." In re Higgins, 158 Cal. 355, 358, 111 P 8.

John v. Sharp, 148 Ala. 665, 41 S 635, 636.

[a] Where the court has a discretion in fixing the compensation of an executor or administrator "the fact that he has saved the estate the expense of the employment of an attorney is one of the matters fairly to be taken into consideration." Nelson v. Schoonover, 89 Kan. 779, 782, 783, 132 P 1183, AnnCas1915A 147 (where the court said, however: "An executor cannot in effect employ himself as a lawyer and as a matter of right recover the value of the legal services rendered").

(3) This statute is not retroactive and does not allow compensation for services rendered prior to the time when they took effect. Matter of Daly, supra. (4) Where an administrator contracted with decedent's widow to render services as an attorney in resisting claims against an estate, but performed no service, except as administrator, and he employed other attorneys to conduct the litigation, and they were allowed fees from the estate, he is not entitled to compensation as attorney. In re Lyons, 173 NYS 590.

[c] Distinction between acting as counsel and conducting litigation.—If an executor prefers to act as his own counsel, he cannot charge the estate therefor and receive compensation for professional services in the nature of advice; but if an executor, who is an attorney, institutes or defends suits or other legal proceedings for the protection and benefit of the estate, these services, not being required of him as executor or administrator, or within the line of his duty as such, he is entitled to compensation therefor. McCloskey's Est., 11 Phila. (Pa.) 95. To like effect In re Mumma, 6 AmLReg (Pa.) 489.

[d] Amount of allowance.—The representative should be deemed entitled, not to the usual professional charges as a specific sum, but to a fair and reasonable allowance for his own services. Clark v. Knox, 70 Ala.

[§ 548] (f) Services Which Representative Should Perform. An executor or administrator is not entitled to devolve his own fiduciary duties upon an attorney engaged at the cost of the estate; or to claim allowance from the estate for extravagant counsel hire, or for his payments made to others for doing work of the estate which did not require professional or expert skill, but was within his own general province as personal representative, and might fairly be compensated for by the usual allowance to a fiduciary.[41] But on the other hand the fact that the representative is himself a lawyer does not obligate him to attend in person to the law business of the estate, but he may employ another attorney for such services.[42]

[§ 549] (10) Fund Out of Which Allowance Made. Allowances to an administrator for attorney's fees and costs are made for the protection of the estate[43] and can be allowed only out of money belonging thereto.[44] Where an executor brought a suit to test the validity of a bequest and the bequest was upheld, he was not entitled to costs and counsel fees out of the proceeds of the sale of the property bequeathed.[45] Where an action by an executor to determine the rights of defendants to share in a certain fund in his hands was determined in favor of defendants, the executor was not entitled to deduct counsel fees from the fund before distribution, where there was a sufficient estate left in his hands for that purpose.[46] Where a will was admitted to probate, and one of the heirs was appointed executor, and by undue means an election by the widow to take under the will was procured, but on suit brought by her was afterward set aside, the costs and attorney's fees incurred by the executor in defending the action could not be paid out of the estate until after the widow obtained her share.[47] Where, on partition of realty for purposes of distribution, the court ordered one portion thereof sold, the executor who made the sale had no authority to pay attorney's fees, except so far as the court might order them to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale.[48] In a case where a substituted trustee, accounting for the acts of a prior deceased trustee, was also executor to that trustee, the court divided between the estates a bill of his attorneys for services which were beneficial to both estates.[49] Where a will contest was conducted by the executor mainly in the interest of a particular beneficiary under the will, it has been regarded as proper to allow the attorneys' fees incurred and paid by the executor as a charge on the share of such beneficiary rather than as a charge on the general estate.[50] Testamentary directions in respect to such expenses must be given their legal effect.[51]

607, 45 AmR 93.

[e] Extra fees.—Where an executor, in accepting the trust, is compelled to abandon his general practice at law, such fact is not a ground for the allowance of extra fees, unless his time has been occupied in performing extraordinary services. Chatfield v. Swing, 6 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 666, 7 AmLRec 326.

51. Hampden Trust Co. v. Leary, 186 Mass. 577, 72 NE 88.

[a] "May" in trust deed referred to in will.—On the same day that a testator executed his will he made a deed to a trust company, executor under the will, conveying all of his real estate on certain trusts. The deed provided that after the testator's death the trustee "may" use as much of the income from the property, or the proceeds of its sale, as may be necessary in defending any proceedings brought to invalidate the trust. The will was made subject to the provision of the deed, with a scheme for the disposition of the property conveyed by the deed if it should be set aside. Testator had a substantial amount of personal property which was disposed of by the will. No proceedings were brought to set aside the deed, except so far as its validity was involved in the controversy as to the validity of the will. It was held that a contention that items in the executor's account for payments made by the executor for expenses of defending the estate from claims which were deemed unjust, of proving the will, and resisting an attack on it should not be allowed out of the personalty, because the word "may" in the ninth clause of the deed means "must," requiring such expenses to be paid from the trust estate, was untenable, in view of other clauses of the deed, in which the grantor drew distinctions between "may" and "shall." Hampden Trust Co. v. Leary, 186 Mass. 577, 72 NE 88.

tor or administrator is entitled to credit for taxes and assessments properly paid by him in the exercise of his duties as such,[52] and this notwithstanding the fact that there is some technical defect in the assessment,[53] or the law under which the assessment was paid is afterward declared unconstitutional;[54] and conversely executors who have paid all the funds belonging to the estate to legatees are not thereby excused from paying taxes on the estate which they had neglected to pay while they had funds of the estate in their possession.[55] Even where the personal representative has paid out taxes not strictly in the line of his official duty, an adjustment of taxes among the persons in interest may properly reimburse him, and the land may be subjected to his lien or a set-off allowed.[56] But where an administratrix held a claim secured by mortgage against the estate, and failed to list her mortgage interest, which exceeded the value of the property mortgaged, for taxation, but permitted the land to be taxed as though no mortgage existed thereon, she was not entitled to a credit for taxes paid by her as administratrix on the real estate described in the mortgage.[57]

Working out highway tax. Where an executor works out a highway tax personally instead of paying the money or hiring another person to do the work, he should be allowed therefor in his account.[58]

Where testator did not die seized of all the property on which taxes were paid, the executor is not entitled to credit for the payment of taxes, where it is not shown what portion was on the testator's property.[59]

Property out of the state. Payment of taxes by an executor on lands in a state where he had not taken out administration, being voluntary and without authority, is like the payment of a debt by any stranger, and furnishes no foundation of a legal claim by him.[60]

Testamentary direction. Where a testatrix, by her will, directed the executor to pay the collateral inheritance tax on her whole estate, including that on any bequest or legacies made by the will, out of the corpus of the estate, so that legatees should receive their legacies free of all tax, a revenue tax on legacies, imposed by an act of congress passed after the execution of the will, was not payable out of the corpus of the estate.[61]

Penalty. A claim by a personal representative for money paid as a penalty on taxes should be disallowed where the penalty accrued by reason of the representative's neglect.[62]

An executor who pays taxes in his private capacity on notes claimed by him under an incomplete gift from testator, and who subsequently accounts for the notes in his capacity as executor, is entitled to an allowance for the amount paid as taxes,[63] but an executor whose wife is the residuary legatee under the will is not entitled to credit for sums paid for taxes on his wife's land.[64] which has been paid by the representative, should be allowed as a proper expenditure.[65]

Amounts improperly paid as taxes by the representative cannot, it has been held, be allowed,[66] but it has also been held that an executrix who has paid an inheritance tax to the federal government should not be surcharged to the amount thereof, on it subsequently appearing that the tax was not a proper one, it being conceded that the sum paid may be recovered.[67]

[§ 551] i. Insurance Premiums. The personal representative is not entitled to credit for the payment of assessments on a policy of insurance in which his decedent had no interest and in which his estate has none;[68] but where, in the exercise of good faith and reasonable prudence, he insures personal property, as assets of the estate, against fire, he is entitled to reimbursement for the premium paid,[69] and while he is usually not concerned in insurance upon the real property, since that belongs rather to the heirs or devisees,[70] yet where he has direction and control of the property, or reasonably expects that an insufficiency of the personal assets to pay the debts of the estate may render a sale of the real estate necessary, the insurance by him of the buildings may be prudent and an allowance therefor justified.[71] The court may, however, refuse to allow credit for money paid for insurance where the amount paid is so greatly out of proportion to the amount realized by a sale of the property as to indicate that the payment was imprudent and reckless.[72]

Life insurance. An administratrix is not entitled to credit for payments during decedent's lifetime of premiums on life insurance policies of the decedent in which she was the beneficiary.[73] But an administrator who has acted in good faith and with reasonable prudence may be allowed credit for amounts paid as premiums on a life insurance policy held as collateral to a note given to decedent, although there was ultimately a loss to the estate.[74]

[§ 552] j. Judgments against Representative. Where a creditor of the estate has recovered and collected a judgment against the executor or administrator, the representative will be allowed credit in his accounts for the amount thereof, including costs, when it appears that he acted within the rule of reasonable prudence and discretion and was not guilty of negligence, bad faith, or other improper conduct;[75] but it is otherwise where the circumstances indicate bad faith or culpable remissness on the part of the representative.[76]

[§ 553] k. Interest Paid. Where it is not shown that the personal representative had moneys in hand sufficient to take up notes of decedent, he is entitled to credit for interest paid to procure the extension of such notes;[77] and where, under the terms of a will, the executor had large discretionary powers, the court has allowed him to charge the estate with usurious interest paid in order to prevent the sacrifice of the property.[78] But where a special administrator has been ordered not to pay out money without an order of court, he is not entitled to credit for money paid without an order, as interest on notes held against the estate.[79] Where an executor received moneys and paid them out on debts of the estate and legacies, he cannot be allowed interest on a preferred claim which remains unpaid in consequence.[80] It has been held that credit may be allowed for interest paid on a debt secured by a mortgage of real estate;[81] but there is also authority for the view that the representative should not after the death of decedent pay interest on mortgages or other encumbrances on the land, accruing after decedent's death,[82] and cannot be al-

[§ 554] l. Traveling Expenses. In the settlement of an executor's or administrator's account, reasonable and necessary traveling expenses incurred in performing the duties of his trust should be allowed;[85] but it is otherwise where the expenses were needlessly or unreasonably incurred, or the representative was put to no actual cost, or journeyed rather upon his own business, or that of the heirs.[86] It has also been held that expenses incurred by a special administrator in traveling from another state, in which he resided, for the purpose of procuring his appointment are not allowable in his account.[87]

[§ 555] m. Procuring Bond. In some states the statutes allow the expense of procuring a bond for the representative to be charged against the estate;[88] but in the absence of such a statute it is well settled as a general rule that the amount paid by the personal representative to a guaranty or indemnity company or to individual bondsmen, in order to procure sureties on his official bond is not chargeable against the estate, in addition to his usual recompense,[89] although a contrary view has been expressed.[90] The representative is, however, properly allowed the expense of a bond given to supersede a judgment rendered against the estate,[91] or a special bond which is necessary in order to collect assets,[92] and it has been held that where, at the instance of legatees, an executrix was ordered by the court to give a bond on pain of discharge, she should be allowed the expense thereof, since, if she had failed to furnish the bond and had been discharged, the substituted administrator would have been obliged to furnish one incurring in all probability the same expense.[93] But where an executor was authorized to carry on testator's business as a cabinet maker and builder, but not to become a member of a building trades employers' association, or to pledge the estate's assets for such purpose, and the executor's agent in managing the business, being a member of such association, obtained a bond to qualify as such member, applying for the bond in the name under which the business was carried on, and agreeing to indemnify the surety against liability, the estate cannot be compelled to indemnify the surety, it not appearing that the estate derived advantage from the agent's membership in the association.[94]

as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, such executor is entitled to an allowance for payments made by his decedent to a contestant, who claimed as heir of such deceased husband.[20] An administratrix has also been held entitled to credit in her accounts for amounts paid by her during decedent's lifetime for the support of decedent and his family.[21]

Courts have refused to allow the representative credit for money paid out at the mere verbal request of the decedent on his deathbed,[22] or for pew rent[23] or publishing in a county other than that provided by statute a notice of sale of real estate,[24] expenses incurred upon property while in another jurisdiction,[25] liquors used at an auction sale of assets,[26] money expended in carrying out a void trust,[27] the expense of surveying a line between the property of deceased and that of an adjoining proprietor,[28] the administrator's expenses preliminary to applying for letters,[29] or his time and money expended while endeavoring to effect a private settlement with the heirs.[30] It has been held that an executor has no right to buy off contestants of the will and charge the expense against the estate,[31] but there is also authority for the view that an amount paid to contestants of the will as a compromise in settlement of the will contest is chargeable as part of the expenses of administration.[32] Where a widow had only a life estate in certain lands of her husband, his administrator de bonis non with the will annexed had no authority to apply the rents accruing after the termination of the life estate or the proceeds of the sale of the land to the widow's debts, her funeral expenses, or a tombstone for her, and such use of the money constituted a misappropriation.[33] A special administrator whose duty is to preserve the estate is not entitled to an allowance for expenditures in having an examination of a mine, in which the estate held stock, for the purpose of ascertaining its value,[34] or for a detective to watch the executors, who have been removed at his suit, because they have not turned over all the papers and he believes them dishonest, where they have never refused to produce any paper when asked.[35]

[§ 558] 9. Interest on Expenditures. Under due circumstances the advance of money to the estate by an executor or administrator will not only be justified but commended, so as to entitle him to a fair allowance of interest thereon;[36] but such a charge will be viewed with caution and the circumstances scrutinized, and where no necessity existed justifying such advance, or where the advantage claimed did not actually exist, interest may be disallowed.[37]

"The fundamental principle, dictated no less by morality and practical honesty than by the law in regard to a trustee, whether executor or administrator or guardian, or in cases of an ordinary nature, is that he shall derive to himself no gain, benefit, or advantage by the use of the trust funds. Whatever of profit may be made, or may accrue, shall belong to and become parcel of the estate." Voorhees v. Stoothoff, 11 N. J. L. 145, 148.

[a] The representative is presumed to act for the benefit of the estate (1) and not for his individual benefit when acting in reference to the subject of his trust. Johnson v. [b] Dealing with coexecutors.—An executor contracted to sell certain shares of stock. The executor owned some of the stock at the time of the contract, and purchased some of it afterward from other persons. He also purchased from his coexecutors stock belonging to the estate, paying therefor the same price which he had paid to other persons for similar stock, which, however, was one hundred dollars a share less than he had contracted to sell it for. The sale was consummated under the contract which also provided that the executor should not engage in a certain business for a prescribed period of time. As payment for the stock obtained from the estate, the executor obtained the consent of his coexecutors to invest the funds of the estate in certain bonds and turned over to the estate a sufficient quantity of these bonds which were owned by him, to pay for the stock. It was held that the executor was chargeable with the amount which he received for stock purchased for the estate. resentative cannot, of course, acquire title by adverse holding to any of the assets.[50] An administrator who holds a judgment in his own name, and an assigned judgment in the name of his estate against the same land is in duty bound on selling the land under the judgments to see that it brings the highest price obtainable, and is precluded, by virtue of his relation to the estate of his decedent, from becoming a purchaser at the sale.[51]

Extent and limits of rule. Where it is shown that the transaction was in good faith and promotive of the interests of the estate, the general rule may not be applied with the usual strictness.[52] An executor may transfer at par, in settlement of a legacy, stock that is worth less than par, and at the same time agree to repurchase the stock later at an advanced price on his personal account.[53] The representative may properly apply the assets of the estate to the payment of a debt of his decedent in its due order, although he is individually liable as the decedent's surety,[54] or even, it has been held, where he is in his individual capacity the principal debtor, and the decedent the surety.[55] An executor who without authority sells corporate stock belonging to the estate is liable only for the loss then resulting to the estate, and legatees cannot hold him to account as trustee for profits made by him some years subsequently in the repurchase and sale of such stock.[56] While a representative cannot take an assignment of a mortgage on his decedent's land and exercise the power of sale therein to foreclose to the injury of the heirs,[57] he may, with his own funds, purchase and take an assignment of a note outstanding against his decedent,

[a] Illustrations.—(1) A debtor delivered possession of lands to a creditor, who was to rent it and apply the rents to the payment of his debt and a debt owing to another creditor. The creditors agreed to apportion between themselves any sums realized from the lands. Afterward the first creditor sued the debtor, attached the lands, and recovered judgment, whereupon the second creditor did the like. The former agreed that the attachment liens should be equal in priority. The latter assigned his judgment in payment of a claim against him in favor of an estate of which the former was administrator, and it was again agreed that the judgments should be equal in priority. It was held that the first creditor could not cut off the rights of the estate of which he was administrator by selling the property under his own judgment, but was bound to divide the proceeds of the sale pro rata between the estate and himself. Montgomery v. Black, 75 Ark. 184, 86 SW 1006. (2) Where complainant, as testator's widow, was entitled under his will to the whole income of his estate, as her own, and one of the executors refused to consent to the formation of a corporation to take over a business in which testator was interested until complainant signed a contract transferring to defendant and his sister twenty-nine per cent each of her income from the estate, exclusive of the family residence, such contract was obtained by defendant by an abuse of his position as executor, and was therefore voidable. Slater v. Slater, 114 App. Div. 160, 99 NYS 564 [aff 46 Misc. 332, 94 NYS 900, and aff 188 N. Y. 633 mem, 81 NE 1176 mem]. (3) Where executrix, with her own funds, redeemed land from the mortgage debt of the testatrix, she held it for the benefit of creditors, regardless of the form of the conveyance to her, or of the fact that she had sold it to a third party. Horton v. Robinson, 212 Mass. 248, 98 NE 681. (4) Where a purchaser of land under an executory contract, by making permanent improvements, increased the value of the land, he had an equitable interest in it, and his administrator could not deprive his creditors of their right by paying the purchase money and taking a deed to himself from the vendor. Whiddon v. Williams, 98 Ga. 310, 24 SE 437. (5) After the death of a purchaser of land, prior to the maturity of the purchase-money note, her administrator was not authorized, merely by virtue of his office, to make a private contract with the vendor whereby a contract between the purchaser and vendor for sale of timber on the land to the vendor was rescinded, and the bond for title and possession of the land surrendered to the administrator, and indebtedness of the purchaser to the vendor and a debt of the administrator to the vendor were canceled. Jones v. Ragan, 136 Ga. 653, 71 SE 1098. (6) Where executrix, to whom an order of sale of a tract of land of the estate to pay debts was granted, under which the land might have been sold for enough to pay the mortgage debt thereon with the debts at large of the estate and costs of administration, and who purposely delayed making a sale until the land was sold under a trust deed, with the intent of becoming the purchaser, did become such purchaser for a sum sufficient to pay only the mortgage debt and costs, which was paid from her own funds, she will be devested of the title so acquired, and the same will be revested in the estate subject to subrogation in her favor to the rights of the cestui que trust under the trust deed. Stitt v. Stitt, 205 Mo. 155, 103 SW 547.

[d] Subscription to additional corporate stock in individual capacity.—An executor of a deceased stockholder of a corporation which has increased its stock has no right to make a profit for himself by taking additional shares which the estate is entitled to subscribe for in his own name, and he must surrender such shares, with the dividends earned thereon; but he is entitled to credit his accounts for the amount paid on the stock from his own funds. Houghteling v. Stockbridge, 136 Mich. 544, 99 NW 759 (the action of an executor and his associates in purchasing stock in a corporation in which the estate was interested, and in giving a bond in which the corporation was principal and they sureties, conditioned to save the seller harmless from liability under the laws of the domicile of the corporation, was not subject to criticism on the part of the estate which the executor represented, or any other stockholder). (2) Where an administrator having mortgaged certain property jointly with his intestate to secure their joint debt, thereafter negotiated alone on a mortgage of the same property and other property belonging to the estate for the purpose of paying his individual indebtedness and also that of the estate, he was entitled to use such mortgage for the purpose of fixing the lien of the mortgage debt as a claim against the estate, and to secure him against subsequent liens on the property of the estate, if any, and to hold it as a mortgage on the property of the estate to the extent of the moneys advanced by him on behalf of the estate in making the purchase. Smith v. Goethe, 147 Cal. 725, 82 P 384.

[b] Purchase of mortgage at discount in belief that property belongs to estate.—Where an executor in the belief that mortgaged property belongs to the estate purchases the mortgage at a discount with his own individual money but makes no profit out of the transaction the mortgagor will not be entitled to a rebate of the discount. ment of Assets—1. In General. An executor or administrator is personally liable to those who are interested in the estate as heirs, distributees, creditors, or otherwise,[68] for waste [69] or for conversion,[70] misapplication,[71] or embezzlement [72] of the assets of the estate, and in modern practice a convenient remedy is found by action upon his official bond,[73] although statute penalties are also prescribed for conversion, embezzlement, and kindred offenses committed by the representative.[74]

[§ 563] 2. Waste—a. What Constitutes. A waste of assets, or devastavit, is any mismanagement of the estate and effects of a decedent, or any squandering or misapplication of the assets, contrary to the duty imposed on the executor or administrator,[75] and consists of any act, omission, or mismanagement by reason of which the estate suffers loss.[76] Waste may consist in cutting timber

[a] Rights on recovery of converted assets.—Where an administrator wrongfully withholds from his accounts certain funds belonging to the estate, and the court orders a distribution of the funds thereby shown to be on hand to the creditors of a certain class, pursuant to which the administrator pays a dividend on the basis shown by the account, and takes a receipt in full settlement of the creditors' claims, he is not, on subsequently being compelled to account for the funds, entitled to the difference between the amount paid and what he should have paid had the account pursuant to which the dividend was declared been correct, as such profit accrues to the estate. Jacoway v. Hall, 67 Ark. 340, 55 SW 12.

[b] Effect of offer of settlement.—The fact that executors of an estate who used the money of the estate for their own purposes offered a settlement to those excepting to their final accounting, which was refused, is no defense. Meyer v. Meyer, (Miss.) 64 S 420.

[c] In an action by a special administrator against the administrator for conversion of property of the decedent, no recovery can be had for any conversion after the death of decedent, but any such conversion must be reached by proceedings under the statute, relative to accounts of administrators. [d] A conversion does not operate as a partial partition among the executor and other legatees so as to avoid the liability incurred by the executor in consequence of his wrongful act, where the will required payment of all the debts as a condition precedent to partition, and the appropriation by the executor was not in furtherance of an intent to make partition. [b] Proceeds of sale not belonging to estate.—Where an administrator sells realty of the estate under order of court directing that one third of the proceeds be paid to the widow of the intestate, and pays out for the estate a sum exceeding two thirds of the total proceeds of the sale, but fails to account to the widow for the balance, he is not liable to the estate on his bond for a devastavit, as the sum for which he failed to account belongs to the widow, and not to the estate. "The assent to, or payment of legacies, leaving debts of the testator outstanding, inverts the order in which the law appropriates the assets. It gives priority to the rights and claims of legatees, which are by law secondary, and subordinates to the rights of creditors. At common law, if an executor voluntarily, in ignorance of outstanding debts, assented to, or paid legacies, he was guilty of a maladministration, and was liable to creditors as for a devastavit. It was esteemed his own folly to make such payments, or yield assent to legacies, without the protection of the decree of a court of equity, or without demanding the indemnity of a refunding bond." fied assets is conclusive as to the application of such assets,[4] and it is waste for him to make any other application of them.[5] Where a husband was indebted to an estate in which his wife was interested as a legatee, and the executor, who was also the residuary legatee and on the verge of insolvency, delivered to the husband securities for the debt, such act constituted a devastavit as to the testator's legatees and creditors.[6]

Acts not constituting waste. The payment of interest on obligations of decedent, although it might have been avoided, is not necessarily waste;[7] nor is the mere fact that an administrator expends money in a reasonable effort to save property of his intestate situated in another state sufficient to convict him of a devastavit.[8] Where the administrator permitted a caretaker to use furniture belonging to decedent and the furniture was damaged in an amount less than the costs of properly caring for the furniture otherwise, there was no devastavit.[9] An executor or administrator with the will annexed, who makes payment of a legacy, does not become guilty of a devastavit because subsequently probate of the will is revoked or the will is adjudged invalid.[10] The administrators of the insolvent estate of a deceased mortgagor are not liable in damages to his mortgagee as upon a devastavit, because they release the purchaser of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged property from his liability to indemnify the mortgagor in respect of the mortgage, no claim having been made upon them by the mortgagee in respect to the mortgage.[11]

Necessity for violation of order of court. It has been held that there can be no devastavit which will sustain an action against an administrator until he has violated an order of the probate court to pay creditors.[12]

[§ 564] b. Nature of Liability. While waste or conversion by an executor or administrator raises a quasi contractual obligation on his part to the person injured,[13] it has been held that such liability is not contractual within the meaning of statutes conferring jurisdiction of actions on contracts express or implied.[14]

[§ 565] c. Liability for Acts of Other Persons. Acquiescence in waste or conversion by another may render the representative liable.[15] An executor or administrator is liable for a devastavit committed by his wife during coverture,[16] and if a devastavit is committed by the husband of an executrix, and she survives him, she is chargeable with the loss suffered by the estate.[17] An executor or administrator is not, however, chargeable with, or responsible for, the acts of his predecessor in office,[18] nor can he be held to respond for the acts of a coexecutor or coadministrator,[19] unless all the representatives acted jointly, or those not acting connived at the devastavit or omitted to perform their duty to the estate.[20]

[§ 566] d. Evidence. A devastavit will not be presumed.[21] In an action of debt against an executor merely suggesting a devastavit, the executor is not to be held personally liable, as a devastavit can only be established by establishing the debt against the estate by matter of record, and showing assets admitted by defendant's plea, confession, or default, or found by the verdict of a jury, against a plea of plene administravit generally, and that defendant has wasted such assets.[22]

[§ 567] e. Effect of Consent or Concurrence. One cannot charge as a devastavit in the personal representative an act done with his own consent and concurrence;[23] but the assent of the guardian ad litem of an infant legatee or distributee will not discharge the representative from liability.[24]

[§ 568] f. Rank of Claims for Waste. It has been held that a creditor holding a specialty debt due from an intestate and coming against the estate of his administrator, on account of a devastavit, can only take equally with such administrator's simple contract creditors, while his sureties must make up the balance.[25]

[§ 569] g. Restraining Waste. The representative may be restrained from committing waste[26]

or ruining the estate by collusion with pretended creditors;[27] but the power and authority of the representative should not be withheld from him or interfered with except upon satisfactory proofs of such actual misconduct or threatened misconduct as will render the property and estate in his hands in his charge and custody likely to suffer loss and be jeopardized by its further continuance under his control and management.[28]

[§ 570] 3. Conversion—a. What Constitutes.[29] An executor or administrator may be held guilty of conversion where he has corporate stock belonging to decedent assigned to himself personally and for his own benefit,[30] sells or disposes of property of the estate without authority,[31] sells property of decedent and purchases it himself,[32] applies assets of the estate to the use of a firm of which he is a member,[33] pays his own debt by a check signed with the name of the estate and the coexecutor,[34] makes a gratuitous bailment of a chattel belonging to the estate,[35] withdraws money deposited in bank to the credit of decedent for a specific purpose, but which decedent had refused to accept,[36] or refuses to allow a domestic servant, to whom the testator has orally given certain articles of personal property, causa mortis, to remove them from the house of the testator.[37] Where testatrix bequeathed to testamentary trustees personal estate, consisting of bonds and mortgages, which was not necessary to pay debts, the act of the executor in collecting such securities and reinvesting the funds constituted a conversion, and rendered him liable to account for the value of the original assets to the trustees in cash.[38]

A representative does not become guilty of conversion by merely asserting ownership of assets rightfully in his possession, although the claim is erroneous,[39] taking securities in his own name for debts due the estate, where he had no fraudulent intent,[40] using property of the estate where he married decedent's widow and there are infant children of her former marriage,[41] taking property of the estate into his possession and using it in connection with his own property without an order of court, for part of the time, and declaring that he intended to continue such use until decedent's debts should be paid when he would give the entire estate to decedent's widow and child,[42] or failing to pay a debt due by him to the estate, which is charged against him in his accounts.[43] Since one having a half interest in notes distributed to heirs under an order of distribution became a tenant in common with the distributees, the mere act of the administrator in turning over the notes to them was not a conversion thereof.[44]

[§ 571] b. Election of Remedies. In case of conversion, the beneficiaries of an estate may elect either to charge the representative with the value of the substituted property and its natural increase, or else to claim and pursue the converted property wherever it can be traced.[45] So also where assets have been transferred to a creditor of the personal representative, other creditors may elect to avoid such transaction, and hold the creditor liable for assets thus received, or may let the transaction stand and charge the personal representative for a devastavit.[46]

[§ 572] 4. Mingling Trust and Personal Funds or Property. An executor or administrator should preserve the funds and property of decedent's estate distinct from his own so that such assets may be known and readily identified;[47] and if he mingles the trust property with his own or with other property, so that the two are indistinguishable, he becomes personally liable;[48] and it has been held that beneficiaries may at their option elect to hold him accountable as for conversion in doing so,[49] although there is an inclination to respect innocent motive and the absence of intent or opportunity to make an individual profit, where due prudence was exercised under all the circumstances, so as to relieve the representative in such case from strict liability as though for conversion.[50] In case of loss the representative is liable without regard to the question whether the loss itself was caused by any fault of his.[51] So also where an executor sells, for a gross sum, goods of which a part belong to him and a part to the estate, money paid to him on account of such sale will be presumed to have been paid on account of the property belonging to the estate.[52]

[§ 573] 5. Extent of Liability. Actual value of the assets at the time of their waste, conversion, embezzlement, or misappropriation, computed in lawful money, is usually the measure of the liability of the executor or administrator who was at fault,[53] and in case of conversion the representative may be charged with the highest value which can properly be placed on the property.[54] Proof that an administrator has converted to his own use a certain sum from the assets of the estate does not, in the absence of an accounting, create any presumption that he has not converted a greater sum.[55] The liability of an executor, on a claim against a vessel in which the testator owned an interest, arising while the vessel was being employed in his own business, has been held to be measured by the extent of the testator's interest.[56]

Conversion of business. Where an administratrix permitted the saloon of her intestate to pass into the control of her husband, and before the settlement of the estate she died, her estate was chargeable with the value of the saloon and interest thereon, and with its profits, if it was conducted in her interest,[57] but she could not be chargeable with the gross receipts, as she must be allowed the expense of conducting it.[58] In a case where the widow of a licensed saloon keeper took out letters of administration on her husband's estate, obtained a transfer of the license to herself, refused a large offer for it, became the tenant of the property in place of decedent, retained the other personal property for her own use, and carried on the business as her own, she was surcharged with a sum sufficient to pay her husband's creditors.[59] Where decedent had conducted his business for twenty-eight years, and after two years immediately succeeding his death the executors formed a corporation and took over [a] What amounts to mingling.—An executor, who renews notes and mortgages of the estate, taking the new notes and mortgages in his individual name without authority of court, in effect mingles trust property with his own the same as if he had deposited trust funds to his own credit. In re Richmond, 9 Cal. A. 402, 99 P 554.

[b] Effect of mingling assets.—When an executor mingles assets of the estate with his own property so that they can no longer be distinguished, the property in such assets is of necessity altered and vested in the executor individually. They become converted, or, technically speaking, "administered," and the executor remains accountable for their value. Union Bank v. Smith, 24 F. Cas. No. 14,362, 4 Cranch C. C. 509; Henderson v. [§ 574] 6. Lien on Property of Representative. There is no specific lien on the property of the representative to make good his waste or embezzlement.[62]

[§ 575] 7. Discharge from Liability.[63] An administratrix who allows her husband to receive and convert to his own use the funds of an infant next of kin is not discharged from liability therefor upon the subsequent appointment of the husband as guardian of such infant, but is equally liable with such guardian.[64] The fact that the representative has distributed the estate of decedent does not relieve him from liability to a creditor who sues him for a devastavit within the period fixed by statute.[65]

[§ 576] M. Loss or Depreciation of Assets—1. In General. Executors and administrators are not insurers, nor will they be chargeable with the loss or depreciation of the assets where they have acted in good faith and with due prudence and diligence in the care and management of the estate,[66] but they are liable for losses which are the consequence of their own neglect of duty.[67]

"The inquiry in this, as in every other case, where a fiduciary is called to account and a liability is sought to be fixed upon him, is, did he act in the particular transaction which is questioned, within the scope of his powers, with good faith and ordinary prudence—not with 'sharpsighted vigilance,' as Chancellor Kent says, but with the same prudence and discretion that a prudent man under like circumstances is accustomed to exercise in his own affairs. If he did so act, 'he is not responsible for the consequences of his act, even though it result unexpectedly in the loss of the trust subject, or any part of it.'" Douglass v. Stephenson, 75 Va. 747, 749.

[a] "The court is prompt to protect an administrator or trustee against loss resulting from an honest mistake, but will not relieve him of loss resulting from measures adopted solely with a view to his own interest." Cooley v. Vansyckle, 14 N. J. Eq. 496, 500.

[b] An executor or administrator is not liable for: (1) Losses due to financial fluctuations. Cheever v. Ellis, 134 Mich. 645, 96 NW 1067. (2) Loss in collecting mortgages taken before his appointment, unless due to his want of reasonable diligence. Cheever v. Ellis, supra (3) An excusable failure to collect rent. Waller v. Ray, 48 Ala. 468. (4) Failure to get the highest price obtainable for property of the estate. Matter of Brower, 71 Misc. 398, 130 NYS 191. (5) Failure to enter deficiency judgments in foreclosures brought by him, where the judgments would have been worthless. Matter of Hayes, 40 Misc. 500, 82 NYS 792. (6) Where an executor, who was testator's son and had an interest in the profits of testator's business, renewed a current note to testator two weeks after his death, and the makers of the note failed eight months after the death, resulting in a loss on the note, the executor cannot be surcharged with the loss if the note was the last of a long series of renewals by the testator, and when it was renewed the makers were in the best credit, apparently solvent, and the executor had no reason to anticipate their failure. In re Hermann, 226 Pa. 543, 75 A 731. (7) Where a testator's personal estate amounted to less than sixty thousand dollars, of which forty thousand dollars was represented in interest-bearing bonds of two railroads, and the balance in other bonds, and he directed by his will that two funds of five thousand dollars each be invested in safe public securities bearing at least six per cent annual interest, or deposited with a trust company, and the interest paid to his sisters during their lives, and he died in 1872, and the administrator set apart five thousand dollars of each of the two classes of railroad bonds, and in the panic of '73 the bonds depreciated and were sold for forty-eight cents on the dollar, the administrator is not chargeable with the loss. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 54 W. Va. 621, 46 SE 589.

[c] A loss of interest arising from a debtor's refusal to pay an executor a debt before probate is too remote a consequence of a delay in proving the will to render the executor liable to account on the footing of willful default. In re Stevens, [1897] 1 Ch. 422 [aff [1898] 1 Ch. 162].

[d] The fact that an administrator pays off a lien on personal property of the estate, which, on a subsequent sale at public auction, fails to bring the amount of the lien, does not establish gross mismanagement of the estate, and the administrator is not chargeable with the loss, where he acted in good faith, and with reasonable care and prudence. In re Armstrong, 125 Cal. 603, 58 P 183.

[e] The burden of proof (1) is on those charging the representative with negligence. Johnson's Est., 11 Phila. (Pa.) 83. (2) It is incumbent upon the representative, if there is sequence of bad faith or the want of due prudence and diligence.[67] The circumstances of each case must be considered in determining whether the representative has acted in good faith and with such prudence and diligence as to relieve him from liability for loss,[68] and as his duty is active, and not passive, to show the cause thereof, so that the court can see if it was incurred without his fault. In re Conser, 40 Or. 133, 66 P 607.

[f] Circumstances disproving negligence.—The contention that an executor was negligent with respect to certain notes, upon the deceased's indorsement of which the estate was held liable, for the reason that they were collectable from the maker, is disproved where it appears that the notes were left unpaid by the maker for several years, and were then disposed of by the holders at a heavy discount. Owen v. Potter, 115 Mich. 556, 73 NW 977.

[g] Between an executor and legatees, a case is to be decided upon a more liberal view of the discretion and power of the executor than as against creditors. In re Semple, 189 Pa. 385, 42 A 28 [rev 28 PittsbLeg JNS 431]. To same effect McNair's App., 4 Rawle (Pa.) 148.

"It is a very serious breach of trust, and a clear violation of law, for executors or trustees to do that which will diminish the value of the property committed to their care; and it is the imperative duty of every court to scrutinize their management of trust property, and hold them personally responsible for any loss which may result from their misconduct, mismanagement, or want of reasonable care and prudence in the discharge of their duties." Martin v. Andrews, 59 Misc. 298, 307, 111 NYS 40.

"The law holds an executor or administrator responsible for the want of due care in protecting the property of the estate from theft or loss, and the measure of the care and skill which they are required to use is that which a prudent man exercises in the direction of his own affairs." Booker v. Armstrong, 93 Mo. 49, 59, 4 SW 727.

[a] A representative has been held liable for: (1) A loss resulting from neglect to have a "vacancy permit" from an insurance company extended, the property having been destroyed by fire within the time for which the company had agreed to extend the permit upon application. Henderson Trust Co. v. Stuart, 108 Ky. 167, 55 SW 1082, 21 KyL 1164, 48 LRA 49. (2) Rent lost by his neglect. In re Saier, 158 Mich. 170, 122 NW 563. (3) A loss resulting from his granting a solvent surety on a note, the maker of which was insolvent, an extension of time until the note was barred. Foster v. Foster, 71 SW 524, 24 KyL 1396. (4) Taxes and penalties accumulating because of their failure to pay taxes on the real estate and permitting the widow, entitled to the net income of the estate, to take the gross rentals. Matter of Wagner, 132 App. Div. 306, 117 NYS 53. (5) Failure to secure a discount in paying the inheritance tax, when he had ample funds. In re Slater, (N. J. Prerog.) 102 A 384. (6) A debt loss through his relinquishing the security therefor. Fisher v. Skillman, 18 N. J. Eq. 229. (7) Money paid under an erroneous order of court which he failed to oppose. Brewer v. Hutton, 45 W. Va. 106, 30 SE 81, 72 AmSR 804. (8) Where a will showed that testator contemplated a settlement of his estate within three years, but the executor, by trading in realty and securities, prolonged the period of distribution, whereby losses resulted, the executor was properly surcharged with such losses and with payments for which the estate was not liable. In re Fulmer, 243 Pa. 226, 89 A 974. (9) An executor is rightly charged with the value of property as lost to the estate, on his testimony that he thought it belonged to the estate, but nevertheless abandoned a suit for its recovery, which he had begun, and allowed defendant therein to keep it on payment to him of money which he retained for himself. In re Pease, 149 Cal. 167, 85 P 149.

[b] Money improperly retained.—An administrator who improperly retains money which it is his duty to pay over at once to the persons entitled thereto is liable if it is subsequently lost through the failure of the bank in which he has deposited it. Harlow v. Mills, 58 Hun 391, 12 NYS 197.

[c] Liability as bailee.—(1) In the United States it is generally held that the liability of an executor or administrator for property of the estate in his hands is that of an ordinary bailee for hire. Lehman v. Robertson, 84 Ala. 489, 4 S 728; Carrico v. Brummel, 5 KyL 775; State v. Meagher, 44 Mo. 356, 100 AmD 298. (2) But in England it is held that he stands in the position of a gratuitous bailee. Job v. Job, 6 Ch. D. 562.

[d] The fact that testatrix had been unwilling to insure certain buildings did not excuse the executor from insuring the building so as to relieve him from liability for loss by fire. In re Ramsey, (N. J. Prerog.) 66 A 410.

[e] A testamentary limitation of the executor's liability will not readily be construed into an exemption from liability for mismanagement. Richardson's Est., 12 Phila. (Pa.) 32.

[f] Estoppel.—Where an administrator permitted a third person to acquire a title by possession to personal property of which the intestate died possessed, it was held that he could not, in a suit by the distributees for an account, deny the title of the intestate, and set up a title in a third person which had never been enforced. "The facts and circumstances, which are seldom, if ever, precisely the same in any two of these cases, but are more or less variant, must determine in each particular case whether the fiduciary has acted with that discretion and prudence which the rules of law require under these circumstances." Douglass v. Stephenson, 75 Va. 747, 750.

[a] The principles involved in regulating the liability for losses are (1) that in order not to deter persons from undertaking these offices the court is extremely liberal and (2) that care must be had to guard against abuse. Raphael v. Boehm, 13 Ves. Jr. 407, 33 Reprint 347; Powell v. Evans, 5 Ves. Jr. 839, 31 Reprint 886.

sive, a negligent failure to act may charge him with liability.[69]

[§ 577] 2. Real Property. Wherever an executor or administrator becomes chargeable, under statute or otherwise, with the entire estate of the decedent, the rule stated above[70] applies with respect to real estate.[71]

[§ 578] 3. Property Never in Possession of Representative. An executor or administrator is prima facie liable only for such assets as come into his possession,[72] but he may be charged with the value of property lost through his negligence, although he never had possession of it.[73]

[§ 579] 4. Depreciation of Currency. In case funds of the estate become worthless through depreciation of the legal currency the usual standard of good faith and due diligence should apply.[74]

[§ 580] 5. Loss Through War or Public Authority. The effect of war or public authority exercised de facto is that of vis major, and a personal representative who exercises good faith and such due care and diligence as the circumstances exact should not be charged personally for a loss to the estate thereby occasioned.[75]

[§ 581] 6. Destruction of Property. An executor or administrator is not liable for the destruction of property of the estate by fire or other casualty if he took such precautions to avoid it as a prudent man would take in regard to his own property.[76] But an administrator is not entitled to a credit for nonnegotiable notes belonging to the estate which have been destroyed or stolen, for they may still be sued on and collected as lost instruments.[77]

[§ 582] 7. Theft. The representative is not generally responsible for the loss resulting from property or funds of the estate being stolen,[78] although it is otherwise where the theft is attributable to his own negligence.[79]

[§ 583] 8. Death of Live Stock. Loss in consequence of the death of live stock in the hands of an executor or administrator, resulting from natural causes, is not chargeable to him, where there was no dereliction of duty on his part in retaining possession of them until they died, instead of selling them.[80] The same rule has been applied to

[a] Where an administrator holds depreciated currency (1) it is his duty in good faith to use it to pay debts and administration expenses, and he is liable for any loss that may result from his neglect to perform such duty. Rogers v. Tullos, 51 Miss. 685. (2) But he has been held not liable for not using such currency to pay debts where there was a probability that the estate might prove insolvent. Tompkins v. Tompkins, 18 S. C. 1.

[b] Exchanging currency for gold.—Where an executor in order to pay a coin debt of the estate exchanged five hundred dollars in currency, the property of the estate, for three hundred and seventy dollars in gold, getting current value for the greenbacks, he was liable to account only for the three hundred and seventy dollars. Sanderson's Est., 74 Cal. 199, 15 P 753.

[c] Money paid out.—An administrator cannot be allowed credit for payments alleged to have been received in Confederate money which "perished on his hands," when the fact of such perishing is not proved, but on the contrary his accounts show that he paid out a portion of the sum received. Turbeville v. Flowers, 27 S. C. 331, 3 SE 542.

"If a trustee is robbed, that robbery properly proved shall be a discharge, provided he keeps them [the goods] so as he would keep his own. So it is as to an executor or administrator, who is not to be charged further than goods come to his hands; and for these not to be charged unless guilty of a devastavit; and if robbed, and he could not avoid it, he is not to be charged, at least in this court." Jones v. Lewis, supra [appr Job v. Job, 6 Ch. D. 562].

[a] The ground on which these decisions rest is that the administrator is the representative of the deceased, and is to be regarded as a trustee engaged in administering a private trust, and not as a public officer. State v. Powell, 67 Mo. 395, 29 AmR 512.

[b] Proof of manner of loss.—Where an executor undertakes to discharge himself from responsibility for the funds in his hands on the ground that such funds have been stolen from him, the fact of the loss in the manner asserted should be made to appear as clearly as the case admits. [a] "What is common or ordinary diligence, or the lack of it, is more frequently a question of fact than of law, and . . . 'in every community it must be judged of by the actual state of society, the habits of business, the general usages of life, and the dangers, as well as the institutions, peculiar to the age; so that, although it may not be possible to lay down any very exact rule, applicable to all times and all circumstances, yet that may be said to be common or ordinary diligence in the sense of the law, which men of common prudence generally exercise about their own affairs in the age and country in which they live.'" Lehman v. Robertson, 84 Ala. 489, 491, 4 S 728.

[b] Money retained too long.—An administrator who retains money of the estate in his hands long after the law requires its distribution is liable for it if stolen. Black v. Hurlbut, 73 Wis. 126, 40 NW 673.

[§ 584] 9. Negligence or Fault of Agents or Servants. While the representative has been held liable for loss resulting from the negligence or fault of agents or servants employed by him,[82] and there can be no doubt of such liability where there was concurrent negligence or fault on the part of the representative,[83] the generally accepted view is that the necessity of employing agents or attorneys in the collection of assets involves the risk of loss to the estate by their misconduct, negligence, or nonfeasance, and if a loss be sustained from such cause the executor or administrator is not liable if he exercised due prudence in the selection of the agent or attorney and his conduct was not otherwise negligent or improper.[84]

[§ 585] 10. Failure to Deposit or Safeguard. The representative should be held liable for a loss caused by his failure to deposit or safeguard funds or property according to their character, where he has been lacking in good faith or ordinary prudence, but not otherwise.[85]

[§ 586] 11. Failure to Sell or Delay in Selling. A representative who retains property or assets of the estate instead of selling the same is not, if he acted properly and prudently in so doing, liable for loss or depreciation in value which takes place while such property is retained;[86] but it is other-duty on the part of the administrator in failing to obtain an order of sale. Sparrow's Succ., 44 La. Ann. 475, 10 S 882.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) An executrix of a deceased partner, giving power of attorney to sons of the other partner on his decease, is liable for the loss of the estate by embezzlement under such powers of attorney, where, from family reasons, she made no attempt to secure an accounting, whereby she could have saved the whole amount due the estate. In re Skeer, 236 Pa. 404, 84 A 787, 42 LRANS 170. (2) Where an administratrix, who delivered money belonging to the estate to her attorney for deposit in her name left with him the entire management and care of the estate and paid no attention to the deposit which he made, and the attorney deposited only a part of the money, and took the balance, and also raised and cashed her checks on the deposit which he afterward obtained, the administratrix should be surcharged with the amount the attorney failed to deposit, and also with the raised amount of such checks. In re Beer, 124 NYS 423.

[b] Permitting agent or attorney to retain funds collected.—(1) If an administrator permits an agent or attorney to retain, for several years, money of the estate collected by him, without any effort to collect it from the attorney, and it is thereby lost, the administrator is liable. Abercrombie v. Skinner, 42 Ala. 633; Reilly v. Porcher, 46 App. Div. 290, 61 NYS 662. (2) Thus, where an executor allowed his agent to foreclose a mortgage securing trust funds, take the deed in his name, and hold it for four years, without accounting for the money, he was liable to the estate for the loss caused by the agent's selling the land and appropriating the proceeds. Cheever v. Ellis, 134 Mich. 645, 96 NW 1067. (3) But where the collection was not made until after the death of the executor or administrator, his estate is not liable for misappropriation by the attorney, the debtors having been solvent, and there having been no immediate necessity for the collection of debts. Rayner v. Pearsall, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 578.

[c] The employment to bring suit of a person not authorized to practice law renders the executor personally liable for losses that result from such person's want of skill. Wakeman v. Hazleton, 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 148.

[d] Delegation of authority to collect debts.—If an executor delegates his authority to another generally to collect the debts of the estate without authority in the will, he is liable for money misappropriated by such person. Thus, where the testator directed that his business should be carried on by one P, and the executor permitted him to get in the outstanding debts, the executor was liable for money collected by P and not paid over. Pistor v. Dunbar, 1 Anstr. 107, 145 Reprint 815.

[e] Proceeds of sale lost by insolvency of commission merchant.—Executors are liable to creditors of the estate for the proceeds of cotton lost by the insolvency of the commission merchant to whom the executors had shipped it for sale, where previous unfair dealings on the part of the commission merchant should have put the executors on their guard, although he was not notoriously insolvent at the time of the last shipment. Smith v. Smith, 79 N. C. 455.

[f] Employment of person in confidence of decedent.—An executor or administrator cannot divest himself of all responsibility regarding his trust by employing as agent to act in his stead a person who had been in the confidence and employment of decedent. [b] Employment of broker.—An executor is justified in employing a broker to procure securities authorized by the will and in paying the purchase money to the broker, if he follows the usual and regular course of business adopted by ordinary prudent men in making such investments; and he is not liable if the broker, instead of applying the money as intended, misappropriates it to his own use. wise where he acted imprudently or improperly or exceeded his powers in retaining such property.[87] It has been said that a more liberal view of a representative's discretion in converting the decedent's assets into cash will be taken as regards legatees than as regards creditors.[88] It has been held that a representative who has acted in good faith and by retaining certain assets of the estate realized large profits and eventually disposed of a portion for more than the inventoried value of the whole will not be charged with losses on another portion because of a technical violation of his duty in not disposing of them;[89] but there is also authority for the view that where the executor has improperly retained securities, of which some have appreciated and others have depreciated in value, the beneficiaries may accept the benefit of the appreciation and still hold the representative liable for the loss on the other securities.[90]

[a] Unavoidable delay in settling estate.—Where an administrator could not settle the estate until another estate in which the heirs were interested was settled, and on that account deferred the sale of bank stock of the estate until it had greatly decreased in value, he was not liable for the loss. Matter of Thorp, 31 Misc. 581, 65 NYS 575, 1 Mills 553.

[b] Discretion under will as to time of sale.—Where testator devised the proceeds of real property, and directed the executors to dispose of it at such times as they might adjudge expedient, and at the time of testator's death the property was depreciated, and the executors delayed the sale for a considerable time, hoping for an appreciation, but it depreciated still more, the executors were held not liable for the loss or for necessary expenses in managing the estate. Matter of Hosford, 27 App. Div. 427, 50 NYS 550.

[c] Discretion under order of court as to time of sale.—Where an order of the probate court allowed an administrator to sell the cotton of the estate at such time as he judged best, the administrator was not liable for loss occasioned by depreciation in the price of the cotton between the time of its delivery to him and the time of its sale, in the absence of bad faith or negligence on his part. Nicholson v. Whitlock, 57 S. C. 36, 35 SE 412.

[d] Testamentary request that property be not sold.—Executors are not chargeable with personal liability for failure to sell within three months bank stock of decedent which subsequently became worthless, where the will requested that it be not sold, and disposed of the future dividends. Northrup v. Browne, 204 Fed. 224, 122 CCA 496.

[e] Difficulty as to title.—Where testator at the time of his death had a paper title to certain land, but other parties have been in possession of the land under claim of ownership and title for thirty years, their possession and occupancy being of such a character as to give them valid title under the laws of the state in which the land is situated, the executor cannot be held liable for depreciation of the property because of his failure to sell it as directed by the will. Greiner v. Greiner, 35 N. J. Eq. 134.

[g] Delay in expectation of rise in market.—If an executor, in the honest exercise of his discretion, delays selling goods or securities belonging to the estate in the expectation of a rise in the market, and in the meantime the market falls, he is not liable for the loss. [a] Directions of next of kin not controlling.—An administrator, in determining the time for converting the assets of the estate into money for the purpose of distribution, is not controlled by the directions of one of the next of kin, even to the extent of her share in the estate. Matter of Thompson, 41 Misc. 420, 84 NYS 1111 [aff 178 N. Y. 554 mem, 71 NE 1140 mem].

[b] Assessments on stock.—Executors paying assessments on stock shares take the risk of the shares not being worth the assessment. If they allow the stock to be sold out for assessments, they take the risk that it is then worth more than the assessment. There is no law under which a court can authorize an executor to pay stock assessments. Unless creditors or heirs agree to hold him free from liability he should sell the stock as perishable. [a] Illustration.—Where it was understood among the heirs that an administrator might retain funds for the care of the widow, he was not guilty of negligence in retaining the proceeds of the mortgage and permitting the amount to remain on deposit in a bank until its failure three months later, and he was therefore not liable for the loss. Knapp v. Jessup, 146 Mich. 348, 109 NW 666, 7 LRANS 617.

[b] Circumstances not showing assent of heir.—An administrator carried speculative accounts belonging to his intestate, instead of settling them, as he could have done. In July, 1892, an heir, with the other beneficiaries and the administrator, discussed plans for the distribution of the securities in the hands of the brokers after the debts due the brokers had been paid. No agreement was reached but the heir stated that she would enter into any agreement to which the others would consent. In December, 1892, and in January, 1893, the agent of the heir suggested to the administrator that the estate should be closed, and that it was deviated from the line of his duties.[94]

[§ 590] 15. Acting under Advice of Counsel. Where a representative acted under advice of counsel, in good faith, this fact is entitled to great weight in his favor,[95] and will as a general rule relieve him of liability,[96] although it is not in and of itself sufficient conclusively to excuse him.[97]

[§ 591] 16. Extent of Liability. The liability of an executor or administrator for the loss of assets is measured by the detriment sustained by the estate, which is the value of the property at the date of the loss.[98] Accordingly, where an executor has been held personally liable for losses from his investments of trust funds on insufficient security, and he has obtained for the estate title to the property taken as security, the legatees must quitclaim to him their claim to such property as a condition precedent to his paying the losses.[99]

[§ 592] N. Torts—1. In General. An executor or administrator cannot as such commit a tort, but any tort committed by him is committed individually, and renders him as an individual, and not the estate, liable in damages,[1] especially where the estate has derived no benefit from the representative's tortious act,[2] and the rule is the same whether the injury results from intentional wrong sirable to have it settled as speedily as possible. Previous to this time the heir had expressed to the administrator a wish to obtain her share, and in April, 1893, the agent expressed regret to the administrator that the stocks had not been sold. It was held that the heir did not assent to his carrying the stock after February, 1893, and the administrator was liable to her for losses resulting after such date, although he acted in good faith and with ordinary prudence. [c] Torts of servant of administrator.—Where a servant employed by an administrator in carrying on the business commits a tort while acting within the course of his employment, the administrator is liable therefor in his individual capacity. [d] Penalty for bringing diseased animals into state.—An administrator who sells diseased or infected animals under an order of the probate court is not guilty of a violation of the statute, making it an offense for any person to bring infected or diseased animals into the state, or, after the proclamation by the governor, to receive in charge and transport and convey the same within the state, and also making the offender liable to persons injured thereby. Newell v. Clapp, 97 Wis. 104, 72 NW 366.

[e] Advice to widow.—An executor is not bound to give the widow any advice as to accepting or electing against the will; but if he consents to do so, he must exercise good faith and reasonable diligence. Hence, if the executor fraudulently induces the widow not to dissent from her husband's will within the time required by law, the proceedings assigning her year's support are binding on him. Bolin v. [f] An executor empowered merely to receive the rent of a building until the guardian of an infant devisee is appointed, and owning no estate therein, is not personally responsible for damages caused by the overflow of water from a basin or other fixture therein, which he had no agency, active or passive, in producing. [§ 593] 2. Fraud. The estate of a decedent is not liable for the fraud or false representations of the executor or administrator, but the fiduciary who practices the fraud is answerable personally therefor to the injured person.[5] The executor or administrator in the performance of his duties is, however, bound to act fairly and not fraudulently, and the estate cannot be permitted to derive any unjust or unconscionable advantage from his unauthorized or fraudulent misbehavior,[6] and where it appears that property fraudulently obtained was treated or used as assets of the estate, or that the estate received some benefit from his conduct, recourse may be had accordingly to a corresponding extent.[7] If the fraud is practiced upon or at the expense of the estate or those interested therein, the representative must of course respond therefor individually,[8] but although a transaction between an executor and a legatee will be closely scrutinized,[9] dealings between them are not necessarily fraudulent.[10] The fiduciary is entitled to the presumption of good faith in the discharge of his duties, and fraud, like any other tort, ought to be proved against him;[11] but in a case where plaintiff was the daughter, as well as White v. McFarland, 148 Mo. A. 338, 128 SW 23. It would be fairly deducible from this and other authorities that where an administrator, under such circumstances, sells the property as part of the estate, but which does not in fact belong to the deceased or to his estate, and receives and uses the proceeds as part of said estate, a court of equity would afford relief to the owner by decreeing payment to be made for such property out of the funds of the estate." [c] A general charge of fraud and confederation is not a sufficient ground upon which a court of equity will give aid against administrators alleged to have taken property of an intestate to the creditors of the intestate, where each defendant is sought to be made liable only for such portion of the property as he may have converted to his own use. Winston v. Young, 52 Minn. 1, 53 NW 1015. (3) The mere purchase by an administrator of claims against the estate, although improper, is not fraud of such a character as will authorize a setting aside of his final settlement. Baldwin v. "He has no estate in or title to the lands. He only has the right and power, given exclusively by statute to intercept the rents in certain cases for certain purposes, and to recover the lands for this purpose, and to sell the same if necessary to pay debts of decedent, or he may, in certain cases, sell for distribution among the heirs." Mayer v. Kornegay, 163 Ala. 371, 374, 50 S 880, 136 AmSR 79.

"Upon the death of one seized by a heritable estate in lands, the title descends eo instanti, and vests in the heir at law, if there be no will giving it a different direction; . . . with the title, there also passes to the heir at law the right to the possession and after-accruing rents and profits, subject to the statutory power of the personal representative to take possession and claim rents accruing, or to let to rent, or to obtain an order and sell, for the purposes of administration." Calhoun v. Fletcher, 63 Ala. 574, 580.

"The learned counsel for defendants contend that, pending the administration of the succession, the ownership of the property is vested in the succession; and in support of that contention they cite the cases of New Orleans v. Stewart, 28 La. Ann. 180; State v. Brown, 32 La. Ann. 1020; Carter v. New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 816; and Levy's Succ., 115 La. 377, 39 S 37, 8 LRANS 1180, 5 AnnCas 871. If these decisions went counter to the doctrine expressed by the maxim, 'Le mort saisit le vif,' whereby the ownership of the property is transmitted directly and immediately from the testator to the heir, or to the universal legatee, as the case may be, they would be in the teeth of the Code, and would simply have to be brushed aside. Far from it, they are to the contrary effect. Thus, in the case

decedent vests in his heirs or devisees, subject to the necessities of administration.[15] Accordingly an executor or administrator cannot release or give rights in the land,[16] preserve or impair homestead rights,[17] receive the rents,[18] release a right of way over the land,[19] bind the heirs by consenting to a proceeding for laying out a highway over the land,[20] create a lien on the land by erecting buildings thereon,[21] dedicate land to public use,[22] make a statutory plat,[23] ratify a deed executed by decedent when insane,[24] recover the surplus realized at a tax sale, even though he was in possession,[25] bind the heir by admissions relative to the land or the title thereto,[26] abandon a right of the estate in the location and surveys of public land located under a headright certificate, without express authority from the probate court,[27] object to a judgment vesting the title to the real estate in decedent's widow, where the court has, on the administrator's petition to sell real estate to pay debts, found that he had no right to sell it,[28] or discharge from liability one who has assumed payment of the purchase price of land sold by the testator and secured by rent privileges, which amount had been donated by the testator to a specified person, where such amount is not needed to pay the debts of the succession.[29]

[§ 595] b. Effect of Testamentary Provisions. The testator may, by his will, give to his executor such authority and control over real estate as he sees proper,[30] but the authority of an executor in this respect is strictly limited by the terms of the will.[31] Where the testator authorizes or directs the cited from 32 La. Ann. 1020 (State v. Brown), the court expressly says: 'The maxim "Le mort saisit le vif," is expressly embodied in our Civil Code, and excludes the interposition of any temporary and qualified ownership, such as that of administrators, between the deceased and his heirs. Civ. Code, art. 940, et seq.' These decisions do not mean to hold, and do not hold, that the abstract being called 'succession' is owner of the property in the sense of excluding, or affecting in the slightest degree, the ownership vested in the heir or in the universal legatee. When these decisions speak of the succession being owner, they mean, as a matter of course, that it is holding for the true owner, and merely for the purposes of administration. Nothing that is said in them is intended to detract in the slightest degree from the recognized ownership of the heir, or of the universal legatee, as the case may be, and from the substantial rights (such as that of exemption from taxation) flowing from such ownership. This is very clearly expressed in Cross on Successions, § 35, as follows: 'The seisin of the succession representative operates merely to protect his title as detainer of the property for the purpose of his administration; while the seisin of the heir, conflicting in no respect with the other, operates as the sign of his title as owner of the estate, subject to its liquidation under administration. The former has actual control of the estate under the legal conditions prescribed; but it is the heir or universal legatee, as the case may be, who reaps all the propriety advantages of possession, such as accretion, prescription, perception of fruits, etc. So, Toulier (IV 582) says: "The seisin of the executor does not interefere with that of the heir of blood, or of the universal legatee, in the case where the latter has seisin. It is always the heir who has the véritable possession; he is alone seized as proprietor. The executor possesses only as depositary in the name of the heir, or universal legatee, who can put an end to the seisin by offering to turn over to the executor a sufficient amount to pay the movable legacies, or by giving security for their payment, and that, even when the testator had charged the executor to sell all his property."'" Knisely v. Young, 33 Oh. Cir. Ct. 439. [§ 596] c. Statutory Modifications of Rule. In some jurisdictions the statutes give to the executor or administrator a certain control over the land of decedent,[42] usually either for the purpose of preserving the same from waste during the course of administration,[43] effecting a division and distribution among those entitled,[44] or subjecting it to the payment of the decedent's debts in case the personal assets prove insufficient for this purpose.[45] But such grants, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed and the rights of the representative confined to those which are clearly given to him.[46]

[§ 597] 2. Actions Relating to Realty[47]—a. In General. From the general rule that an executor or administrator has no title to, interest in, or control over the decedent's realty,[48] it follows that he is not ordinarily entitled to bring any action relating thereto.[49]

In the first case the fee passes to the executors; in the last, the fee passes to the heir, to be divested whenever the power is executed by the executors." Ware v. Murph. 24 S. C. L. 54, 55. (2) "There is a difference between a devise to an executor to sell real estate and a devise to an executor of real estate with power to sell. In one case a naked authority is given to sell; in the other an authority to sell, coupled with an interest, is given. In the former case the freehold remains in the heirs until a sale is made by the executor; in the latter case a freehold immediately vests in the executor." Smith v. [§ 598] b. Actions for Trespass and Waste. Actions for trespass and waste accruing after the death of his decedent are maintainable by an executor or administrator, where he is given the right of possession by the provisions of the will or by statute,[50] but in the absence of any testamentary or statutory provision giving him such a right of possession, the general rule that the representative has no concern with the realty precludes the maintenance by him of such an action.[51]

Actions to Quiet Title. It is usually considered that actions to quiet or remove a cloud from the title to a decedent's real estate may be brought by an executor or administrator whose right of possession of such land at the time is established by will or statute,[52] but it is otherwise where the representative has no such right.[53] A creditor of an estate cannot bring suit to remove a cloud from the title of land belonging to the estate, except by leave of court, after refusal of the administrator to

[a] Ferry franchise.—An executor directed by will to lease a ferry may maintain proceedings in equity to be quieted in the enjoyment of the franchise. Newport v. Taylor, 16 B. Mon. (Ky.) 699.

[b] Necessary averments.—Under a statute providing that the real estate of an intestate shall descend to his heirs subject to the payment of debts and that if the personalty is insufficient to pay the debts resort may be had to the realty, which may be sold, mortgaged, or leased by the administrator, a complaint by an administrator in his representative capacity to remove a cloud from the title to realty which fails to aver that the estate is insolvent, or that it is necessary to dispose of the realty to pay the debts, or that there are debts against the estate, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. McKee v. Howe, 17 Colo. 538, 31 P 115. But compare Rice v. Carey, 170 Cal. 748, 151 P 135 (averment that property needed for purposes of administration not necessary).

[c] The prayer of a bill by an administrator to devest title to land out of adverse claimants, alleging that a sale of the land is necessary to pay intestate's debts, should be that the title be vested in intestate's heirs, and not in the administrator, and then, on proper showing, the land could be sold for the debts. Brown v. Mize, 119 Ala. 10, 24 S 453.

[d] Contrary view.—"Under the decedent's law of this state, the right of an administrator to the lands of his decedent is possessory only; and it is readily apparent from the section of the statute quoted that an administrator does not have title within the meaning of that section, so as to authorize him to maintain a suit to quiet title to real estate. In the case of Eayrs v. Nason, 54 Nebr. 143, 74 NW 408, it is held that 'judgment dismissing an administrator's action to quiet title is not a bar to a subsequent action by the heir against the defendants in the administrator's suit to quiet title to the same real estate, which has descended to the heir from the administrator's intestate.' And in that case the court say: 'But an action of ejectment is a possessory action, and while, because of the provisions of our statute, an administrator may maintain such an action, it does not follow that he may maintain an action to quiet title to the decedent's estate by removing a cloud therefrom, and we are of opinion that an administrator, in the absence of statutory authority therefor, cannot maintain such an action.' Under the provisions of the statute of this state, every action, with certain exceptions not material here, must be brought in the name of the real party in interest; and, the right of an administrator to the lands of his decedent being possessory only, he has no such title as will authorize him to maintain an action to quiet title. Such action must be brought in the name of the legatee or heir, the real party in interest." Youngson v. Bond, 64 Nebr. 615, 619, 90 NW 556, 558, 69 Nebr. 356, 95 NW 700, 5 AnnCas 191.

[§ 600] d. Actions for Injuries during Decedent's Lifetime. The executor or administrator is the proper party to maintain an action for damages for an injury to decedent's realty during his lifetime.[55]

[§ 601] 3. Possession and Use—a. In General. The common-law rule, which still prevails except as modified by statute,[56] is that an executor or administrator is not entitled to the possession and use of the real estate of his decedent.[57]

[§ 602] b. Effect of Testamentary Provisions. An executor is entitled to possession of the real estate when the testator has by his will directed or permitted the executor to take possession thereof for any purpose.[58] So, a representative who is authorized to sell is entitled to the control and possession of the title deeds if this is necessary to a proper discharge of his duties,[59] although a mere power or sale does not, of itself, give any right of possession or use of the property until the sale.[60] It has been considered that where the executor is also devisee of land of which he is in possession, he must be regarded as holding the land in the capacity of executor until the debts of the decedent are paid.[61]

[§ 603] c. Statutory Right of Possession—(1) In General. In a number of jurisdictions statutes have been enacted giving to the personal representative, whether executor or administrator, the right under certain circumstances, or even generally, to take possession of the realty either for the purpose of sale or in order to apply as assets the proceeds realized from its use during the period of administration.[62] Where the right of possession is given only under certain circumstances, the repre-

"It descends to the heirs eo instante upon the death of the ancestor with the quantity of each definitely ascertained. From that instant, subject to the right of the administratrix to resort thereto for the payment of the debts of the deceased, they may dispose of the particular property as owners as they choose and are entitled to possession and to the rents and profits. If, in certain contingencies, the administrator takes possession of real estate, this is as official agent of the owners to care for the estate and conserve the rents and profits for their benefit under the direction of the court. The devolution of title is not interrupted or affected thereby, nor by the right of the administrator to sell or mortgage for the satisfaction of debts as each heir may transfer his definite portion subject thereto." "While the executor has the right to the possession, that right is given in contemplation that it may become necessary to exercise it in the settlement of the estate for the purpose of the payment of claims against the estate. Hence it is that the duty of the executor is not made imperative to exercise the right in all cases, but is only permissible when the necessity arises for its exercise; and until such occasion does arise the heir or devisee who has entered upon the enjoyment of his property and estate ought not to be and cannot be lawfully disturbed. In other words, the right is given to the executor, and only accompanies the necessity for its exercise." Rough v. Womer, 76 Mich. 375, 381, 43 NW 573.

[a] Circumstances showing necessity for possession.—A necessity that the administrator should take possession of land occupied by defendant, who was one of the testator's heirs, for his, the administrator's, own protection, was shown by the following facts: Defendant was in possession of the land under a lease which was to terminate at the testator's death. The testator had bequeathed all his personalty to defendant and had devised his realty to his other heirs, but defendant continued in possession under an agreement that the administrator should have authority to withhold from defendant's share of the estate on final distribution the amount of rent due and to become due, and such share was declared by the agreement to be security for the rent. The will was disallowed and appeal was taken from the disallowance. Defendant was in default in payment of rent, and his share of the personalty was insufficient to pay the rent if the disallowance of the will should be affirmed. Wilmarth v. Reed, 83 Mich. 44, 46 NW 1031. See also Kern v. Cooper, 97 Minn. 509, 106 NW 962 (findings that possession necessary for purposes of administration held to be sustained by the evidence).

[b] A necessity for possession is not shown merely by proving that the estate of the intestate is liable for the payment of funeral expenses, and not showing also that there was not a sufficiency of personal property for paying the same, or some good reason why the administrator should make a division of the land or its proceeds among the heirs. Holt v. Anderson, 98 Ga. 220, 25 SE 496.

necessity for the representative taking possession,[66] and upon notice to the heirs or devisees.[67]

The representative must be actually in possession of the land in order to exclude the heir or devisee.[68]

[§ 604] (2) To What Lands Statute Applicable. A statute giving right of possession of lands to the executor or administrator refers to such lands only as belonged to and were left by decedent, and not to lands bid in by the administrator or executor at a sale under execution or mortgage foreclosure, as to which he has the same right of possession as to personalty.[69] Neither does such a statute apply to lands situated in another state.[70]

[§ 605] (3) Nature of Right of Possession. The statutory right of executors and administrators to take possession of their decedents' real estate is temporary and limited to the purposes of administration.[71] Until it is exercised, it does not constitute an intervening estate in possession as against the heir,[72] and it ceases when the debts are paid and the estate settled.[73] But it includes the right to receive the rents,[74] and gives the representative a qualified interest in the land,[75] with all the rights and powers ordinarily incident to the right of possession.[76] The right is subject to the rights of the widow and family to dower and homestead;[77] and as it is purely statutory, it may be taken away after the representative has entered into possession, as well as before.[78]

[§ 606] (4) Relation Back of Possession. It has been held that when an administrator takes possession of his decedent's real estate, such possession relates back to the time of decedent's death.[79]

[§ 607] d. Actions to Recover or Protect Possession—(1) In General. By virtue of the directions of a will or under statute an executor or administrator may be temporarily entitled to prosecute or defend actions for recovering possession of decedent's land, as a sort of trustee or representative of the heirs or devisees and of the general interests of the estate;[80] but, where no interest in the realty of his decedent is thus vested in him, he has no such authority.[81] An administrator in possession of decedent's realty may invoke the aid of

[b] Order of court for possession necessary.—Under the statute an administrator cannot maintain ejectment for the land, nor a suit to remove a cloud from the title, in the absence of an order authorizing him to take possession. Hall v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 145 Mo. 418, 46 SW 1000.

[c] Proof necessary to sustain action.—Under Rev. St. (1892) § 1917, providing that real estate shall descend to the heir or devisee of a decedent, and remain in his possession until the executor or administrator shall take possession of or sell the same, under the order of the court, for the payment of debts, an administrator cannot maintain ejectment for land on proof of title and possession in his intestate at the time of his death, where the action was not commenced until after such statute took effect, and it does not appear when his decedent died, or when plaintiff was appointed, or that he has ever been in possession. Rose v. Withers, 39 Fla. 460, 22 S 724.

[d] Necessity must appear.—"An administrator may, in certain cases, as provided by statute, maintain ejectment against the heirs or strangers to recover the lands of his intestate. However, he can only maintain such action when necessary for the purposes of administration. He can only recover against the heirs by showing the necessity, and such state of facts as is provided by statute. He has no estate in or title to the lands. He only has the right and power, given exclusively by statute, to intercept the rents in certain cases for certain purposes, and to recover the lands for this purpose, and to sell the same if necessary to pay debts of decedent, or he may, in certain cases, sell for distribution among the heirs. He cannot recover the lands from the heirs, who are the legal owners, whatever may be his rights against strangers, without showing the necessity, or the contingency, or the happening of the event for which the statute authorizes him to maintain such action. Without this necessity or contingency provided for, he is a trespasser as against the heirs in attempting to assume to control the lands." Mayer v. In General. The personal representative has at common law no title or right to the rents and profits of the real estate of his decedent, accruing after the latter's death;[90] but possession and control of real estate such as will carry the right to rents and profits may be given to the executor or administrator by the will;[91] and statutes frequently give the representative the right under appropriate circumstances to receive the rents and profits either for the purpose of using them for payment of the debts or for other proper purposes connected with the administration.[92] In order to entitle the representative to the rents and profits under such statutes it must appear that the contingency contemplated by the statute has arisen and that the representative has complied with the requirements of the statute with reference to establishing his right,[93] one of the most usual of which is that there shall be an order of court authorizing the representative to rent or use the land and apply the rents and profits to the purposes of the administration.[94] A mere naked or

[c] Rents received by one who is both administrator and guardian go to the guardianship account. Foteaux v. Lepage, 6 Iowa 123.

[d] Distraining for rent against devisee.—Where a will directed that testator's estate be divided among the children as they came of age or married, and one child married and with her husband occupied lands of the estate, and the executors refused to pay over her share of the estate or account for it, they could not distrain against the husband for rent due. [b] An express authority to take possession of the land, given to the executor by the will, carries with it, as a necessary incident to the possession, the right to take the rents and profits, and this right is not to be deemed as denied because the will contains no provision for their disposition when collected, the implication being that they are to go to the persons beneficially interested in the estate. Hubbard v. Housley, 43 App. Div. 129, 56 NYS 392 [aff 27 Misc. 276, 58 NYS 432, and aff 160 N. Y. 688 mem, 55 NE 1096 mem].

[c] Testamentary provision for payment of encumbrance out of rent.—Although ordinarily the debts of an estate are payable by executors only, where a will devised to testator's son a certain quarry, and provided that the rents arising from the quarry should be applied to discharge the encumbrance on the same, the son was entitled to the rents, in order to apply them on the debt, and they did not go to the executors. Emery v. Owings, 6 Gill (Md.) 191.

[d] Will not giving right to collect rents.—Where the only duty imposed upon the executors under the will with regard to the residuary real estate is to divide it into three equal parts and convey them to trustees, they have no right to lease or collect rents from the land, notwithstanding the fact that such residuary real estate is charged with a trust legacy in favor of one of the executors. [a] Recovery of rents from heir.—Mesne profits may be recovered by an administrator against an heir of intestate claiming as a distributee, where the land has been wrongfully withheld by such heir from the administrator, when it was necessary for the administrator to have possession thereof for the purpose of paying debts and making proper distribution. Craddock v. Kelly, 129 Ga. 818, 60 SE 193.

[b] If there are no creditors and the administrator rents out the land, the accruing rents, when not needed to pay the expenses of administration, belong to the heirs as such, although the legal right to collect is in the administrator, he being a mere trustee for them. Autrey v. Autrey, 94 Ga. 579, 20 SE 431.

[c] Determination of lease.—A statute authorizing administrators to receive, take possession of, sue for, and recover the rents, issues, and profits of the land of their intestates does not give an administrator power to determine an existing lease and sue for possession of the leased premises. Rupp v. Rupp, 11 Colo. A. 36, 52 P 290.

[a] Order not retrospective.—An order of the probate court directing the administrator to take possession of and rent the real estate for the payment of debts can have no retrospective effect, nor can it authorize contingent power to sell does not give the representative a right to the rents and profits, but in such case the heirs or devisees may enter upon the estate and receive all rents and profits until such power is appropriately exercised.[95]

The consent of heirs or devisees may warrant the collection of rents of real estate by the executor,[96] and where rents and profits of real estate have been so received this gives the representative a lawful possession and a good title against all persons except the heirs.[97]

Land leased by decedent. It has been held that, where land is rented for a year and the lessor dies intestate within the year, the heirs have no title, merely as heirs, to the rent accruing for that year, but the rent is personalty and the right to collect and distribute it is in the administrator.[98]

[§ 611] b. Actions to Recover. Where the right to possess or control decedent's land is given by will or local statute, the executor or administrator may recover rent or sue for use and occupation,[99] but he cannot do so where no such rightful control exists.[1]

[§ 612] c. Disposition. It is proper to apply rents on the obligations of the estate;[2] and a representative who has collected rents may be protected where, instead of paying the same over to the heirs or other distributees, he has under prudent and reasonable circumstances applied the same beneficially for the premises, as in keeping down mortgage interest and preventing foreclosure at a sacrifice,[3] for needful labor on the premises,[4] or keeping the buildings in proper repair.[5] But it has been held that an administrator has no authority to apply rents collected to taxes and arrears of ground rent accruing subsequent to the death of decedent.[6] The court has refused to call a widow who was administratrix to account for rents and profits expended in the support of infant children of decedent;[7] and it has been held that under a statute giving executors and administrators possession and control of the real estate not specifically devised during the settlement of the estate, such possession and control was for the benefit of the persons entitled to the real estate and that rents and profits not needed for the payment of debts went on distribution with the land as incident thereto, and did not go to the residuary legatees.[8]

[§ 613] d. Liability of Representative—(1) In General. An executor or administrator who has taken possession or control of the real estate of his decedent must account for the rents and profits thereof;[9] but he is not responsible for rents for a time when the real estate was not in his possession an administrator to recover from the heir rents collected by him after decedent's death, but prior to the order. Bealy v. Blake, 70 Mo. A. 229.

or control unless he has been guilty of some laches or lack of good faith which has resulted in a loss to those entitled to the rents.[10] Where, however, it is necessary to sell lands for payment of debts, and the representative fails to take proper steps to that end within a reasonable time, he may be held liable for rent;[11] and it has been held that an executor who has permitted land, a life estate in which is charged by the will with the payment of expenses of administration, to pass into the possession of the devisee for life, and suffered him to enjoy the rents and profits thereof for more than twenty years, is justly chargeable with rents and profits to the amount of administration expenses.[12] Where testator at his death owned a house and lot occupied by the executor, whose wife was a residuary legatee, and it was agreed that she should have the house and lot in payment of her legacy, and a deed of the same was executed and delivered to her, and the executor with his family continued to occupy the house, and there was nothing to show that it was not advantageous to the estate to settle the claim of the wife by conveying the property, the executor was held not chargeable with the rental value of the property after the execution and delivery of the deed.[13]

[§ 614] (2) In What Capacity Liable. Whether the representative's liability to account for rents and profits is in his representative or his individual capacity depends upon the facts of the particular case.[14] The general rule is that, where the representative is lawfully in possession or control under testamentary or statutory authority, he accounts in his representative capacity for the rents and profits received as assets for the payment of debts or distribution as the case may be,[15] although negligence in the management of the property may subject him to personal liability;[16] while if he has taken possession or control without authority he is not in his representative capacity chargeable with, or liable

[f] An executor who is also residuary devisee is not liable to account for rents and profits received by him. Newcomb v. Stebbins, 9 Metc. (Mass.) 540. But compare McNeely's Succ., 50 La. Ann. 823, 24 S 338 (an executor, who is also the universal legatee, who takes possession ex parte of all the property of the succession, and deals with it as his own, with knowledge of the existence of a minor forced heir, is chargeable with the rents of the portion of the succession which vested in such heir).

[g] Executor as life tenant.—Where an estate is left to the widow for life, she is entitled to the rents and profits until disposition by due process of law; and, if she is executrix and resides on the property, she need not charge herself in her account with rents for the same. H. 412, 52 A 449 (an executor who occupied real estate in which a life interest has been devised to his coexecutor is not chargeable with rent as executor and cannot be credited in that capacity with money expended for taxes repairs, etc.).

[h] Occupation as tenant of person entitled.—An executor is not chargeable in his official capacity with timber, coal, and limestone taken from the testator's land, where he occupied the same as tenant of the life tenant. Lynn's App., 31 Pa. 44, 72 AmD 721. See also McCormick's App., 104 Pa. 146 (where the court refused in a proceeding for distribution to charge the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed with rent for land which he occupied before his appointment under lease from one who held it in trust for the heirs).

[i] Not liable to heirs or devisees.—(1) Where a will provided that the executor should sell the lands and pay the proceeds to certain legatees, it operated as a conversion of land into money at the death of testator, and the executor was not liable to the heirs for rent of the land during the time that it was occupied and cultivated by him. Williams v. Williams, 145 Mo. A. 382, 129 SW 454. (2) Where the estate is unsettled and possibly insolvent, an action will not lie by devisees against the executor for rents collected by him, although he took charge of and leased the property without a formal order of the probate court. [a] Agreement with devisee.—Where executors managed a farm under an arrangement with the sole devisee that they should take the products and account for them as assets, the fact that such sole devisee was also an executor would not prevent the executors from occupying the farm for the benefit of the estate so as to be chargeable with the income, and the products belonged to them in their representative capacity. "If there had been no decree of insolvency—in other words, if the estate had been administered throughout in the solvent course—it would not probably be claimed that the administrators would be officially accountable in the settlement of their probate account for the funds received by them in the management of the real estate. . . . In such a case their acts in collecting the rents would be deemed merely the acts of individuals, and not of administrators, for which they might be personally accountable to the heirs in a proper proceeding, but not in the settlement of their administration account. As administrators, they would have no right, since no duty is imposed upon them, to intermeddle with the real estate of the intestate, in the absence of any suggestion of insolvency to the probate court. From this it necessarily results that, until the decree of insolvency was made, their occupation or management of the real estate in question and their collection of the rents cannot be justified as official acts in the administration of the estate. The sureties on their bond are not liable for their dishonest or unfaithful conduct in relation to matters not falling within the sphere of their official duty. Nor does the subsequent decree in insolvency under which, ordinarily, at least, the administrator is entitled to take possession of the real estate, have such a retroactive effect as to render their previous unauthorized management of the realty an administrative act for which they are accountable in the probate court." [b] Executrix as devisee.—Where realty is devised to a widow for life, subject to the payment of debts and legacies, and she is appointed executrix, she is not liable to account for the rents as executrix and appropriate them to the payment of the debts and legacies, since, as she cannot collect the rent except as devisee, she cannot account for them as executrix. In re Stoop, 31 PittsbLegJ (Pa.) 34.

[c] Presumption of occupation under homestead and dower right.—Where a husband dies leaving a farm, and his widow, who is also administratrix, continues to occupy it with their children, and the statute does not authorize an administrator to have possession of the real estate, her possession will be presumed to be under her homestead and dower right, and she should not be charged with rent in her account as administratrix. Russell v. Wheeler, 129 Mich. 41, 88 NW 73.

[d] In Missouri (1) the rule is that, although the realty descends to the heirs, and the administrator has as a general rule nothing to do with it, yet when, as a matter of fact, he does retain the realty and collects the rents, he is to account for them to the probate court and his sureties are liable. Witnesses in whose judgment I place confidence fix about that as a fair rental value").

[b] Construction of parties to lease.—Where an estate consisted in part of a homestead and a lot adjoining, on which was a building, estly and with due diligence, he is liable only for such rents and profits as he may have received,[23] and that rents or profits to be accounted for by the representative are net, and subject to suitable deductions for his outlays, expenses, and services,[24] although not necessarily for improvements, or for any outlays or expenses inconsistent with an honest and prudent management of the property.[25]

Interest on the value of the rents may sometimes be charged against the representative.[26]

A statute providing a mode for determining the amount due for the use or income of real estate, when the occupation is such as to create a liability therefor, and the disposition of such amount, does not make an executor or administrator liable for the use and occupation of real estate for which he would not otherwise be liable in some form.[27]

[§ 616] 5. Repairs and Improvements.[28] As a general rule the executor or administrator is not authorized to make repairs or improvements thereon and subject the estate or those beneficially interested to such expenditures,[29] but the power to make necessary repairs may of course be given to the executor by the terms of the will[30] or by statute.[31] An executor has been held authorized to make reasonable repairs and improvements on lease-both of which were rented for a gross sum, and testator, the tenant, and the executor considered the rental of the building to be one half of such sum, the construction placed on the lease by the parties controlled, and the executor should be charged in his account with one half of the rent. [a] Implied power.—A representative who has under the statute power to lease lands of his decedent has implied power to contract to repair the leased premises. Vandegrift v. Abbott, 75 Ala. 487.

[b] Limits of power.—Under the act of April 9, 1897 (L. [1897] p 190), providing that executors and trustees holding land in trust under a will shall have power to improve it and erect buildings thereon when it shall be made to appear that the land devised is occupied in whole or in part by buildings that are insecure, dilapidated, or in need of repairs, or that the land is occupied by buildings that are incapable of producing an income proportionate to the value of the land, and that it would be to the advantage of the persons for whose benefit the lands are held that additions, repairs, and improvements be made, or that new buildings be erected, or both, an executrix is not authorized to erect new buildings in the place of buildings formerly standing on the land, which burned to their foundations. In re Arnot, 67 N. J. Eq. 434, 58 A 556 (holding also that as the statute expressly applies only where lands are held in trust for any person or persons for life or the happening of some event, an executrix is not entitled to use trust funds belonging to the estate to erect buildings on real estate subject by the terms of the will to a legal life es-hold property occupied by the legatees or parties in interest jointly, where the lease contained a covenant of renewal, and to pay the value of improvements.[32] A power to make repairs extends only to such repairs as are necessary to keep the property in good condition, and does not authorize the making of improvements.[33] Even though executors and testamentary trustees are authorized by the will to make repairs on buildings devised to them in trust, they are not liable in their representative capacity upon a contract for such repairs.[34] A fund, received by executor of insured upon loss of the house and furniture, and held in trust for the life tenant and the remaindermen under the insured's will, is personalty, and not realty, so that the executor is not required to use it in rebuilding a house on the land.[35]

[§ 617] 6. Taxes and Insurance. The personal representative should not as a general rule pay taxes assessed on real estate after decedent's death, or insurance on buildings, although under particular wills or by virtue of local legislation it may become his duty to do so.[36]

[§ 618] 7. Mortgaged and Encumbered Property—a. Purchase of Encumbrance by Representative. The representative cannot buy for his own benefit a mortgage on the land of the estate;[37] but if he has advanced his own funds to prevent the property from being sacrificed and benefited the estate thereby, the mere fact that he took a transfer of the debt to himself does not render the transaction void,[38] or preclude his being credited with the amount advanced.[39]

[§ 619] b. Discharge of Encumbrance—(1) In Interest of Estate Generally. In some cases it has been considered proper for the personal representative to protect mortgaged or encumbered real estate by paying interest, or even the principal of the debt,[40] and it would seem clear that it is his duty to do this when the real estate is needed for the payment of debts and the particular property is worth more than the amount required to relieve it from the encumbrance thereon,[41] or, as it has been expressed, when the discharge of the encumbrance is beneficial to the estate.[42] On the other hand, however, some cases, applying strictly the rule that the representative is not concerned with the realty,[43] deny that he is under any duty or has any right to apply the assets to removing encumbrances from land[44] which is not needed for the payment of debts or for the purposes of administration.[45] In some states the representative can redeem or maintain a bill to redeem,[46] or an action to cancel a mortgage purporting to be executed by his decetate, with remainder to the children of the life tenants, although the life estate was subject to charges for the benefit of the remaindermen; nor is she entitled to use trust funds belonging to the estate to erect buildings on real estate acquired by her as executrix with funds of the estate).

[a] Court may order administrator to redeem.—Scudder v. Ames, 89 Mo. 496, 14 SW 525.

[b] Circumstances of each case govern.—Whether or not it is the dent, as fraudulent and void,[47] or as having been paid,[48] or to compel an assignment of a mortgage on the realty to prevent foreclosure and thus to save the estate from loss;[49] but the existence of such powers has also been denied.[50] A representative who goes beyond his duty in such matters must bear all losses resulting to the estate,[51] but in the absence of proof that the condition of the estate did not warrant the redemption of mortgaged property it will be presumed that the representative acted properly in redeeming.[52]

Mortgage on property given away by decedent during lifetime. Where a mortgage was given by testator on land which during his lifetime he gave to his widow without any valuable consideration, the land covered by the mortgage was the primary fund out of which it should be paid, and the widow, as executrix, could not in the first instance pay it off from the general property of the estate.[53]

Mortgage executed by representative. Assets of the estate may properly be applied in payment of a real estate mortgage legally executed by an executor or administrator for the purpose of raising funds.[54]

[§ 620] (2) In Interest of Heir or Devisee. The common-law rule that the personalty is the primary fund for payment of decedent's personal debts, to the exoneration of the realty,[55] has been extended so far as to allow the heir or devisee to call upon the executor or administrator to exonerate the realty from a debt constituting a lien thereon, unless the testator has expressed his intention to the contrary in plain and unequivocal terms.[56] The rule relates, however, only to personal debts of decedent; and if he acquired land already subject to a mortgage his representative cannot be called upon to discharge it[57] unless deceduty of the personal representative, pursuant to the authority conferred on him, to redeem land which has been sold under execution or mortgage, depends on the circumstances of each case, and he is held to the exercise of reasonable discretion. McCreedy v. Mier, 64 Ill. 495.

[c] The administrator may redeem without taking out a license to sell; but in such case the result inures to the benefit of the widow and heirs. Clark v. Seagraves, 186 Mass. 430, 71 NE 813.

[e] Decree inures to benefit of widow and heirs.—Where a suit is brought by an administrator to redeem land conveyed by his intestate by a deed absolute in form, but in fact given as a mortgage, if plaintiff has obtained no license to sell, a decree in his favor inures to the benefit of the widow and heirs of the intestate, and defendant must be ordered to make a conveyance to the heirs, subject to the right of the widow to dower if a right of dower exists. dent made the debt his own,[58] a result which is not effected by a mere assumption of the encumbrance by decedent, by means of a covenant in the conveyance to him or some other agreement with the grantor.[59] It is also considered that the rule applies only in favor of the heirs or devisees, and that an alienee of the heir or devisee is not entitled to call on the representative to discharge the mortgage.[60] The common-law rule has been changed by statute in a few jurisdictions so that the person who takes land by descent or devise must satisfy a lien thereon out of his own property without resorting to the representative unless the testator expressly directs that the lien be otherwise paid.[61]

See also cases infra notes 58, 59.

"If it [the estate] come by descent or devise, and the testator has done no act to make the debt his own, his devisee will take the estate cum onere, and the executors are not chargeable with the mortgage; and the rule is the same even where the testator has purchased the estate, if he have had no connection or contract or communication with the mortgagee, and have done no act to show an intention to transfer the debt from the estate to himself." "The question is not whether the decedent assumed to pay the mortgage, and so made himself liable therefor, as between him and his grantor, but whether he, by direct action, made himself liable, in his personal estate, to the mortgagee; that is, as between him and the mortgagee, expressly made the debt his own." Mount v. Van Ness, 33 N. J. Eq. 262, 265 [aff 35 N. J. Eq. 113].

"When a man gives a bond and mortgage for a debt of his own contracting, the mortgage is understood to be merely a collateral security for the personal obligation. But when a man purchases, or has devised to him, land with an encumbrance on it, he becomes a debtor only in respect to the land; and if he promises to pay it, it is a promise rather on account of the land, which continues, notwithstanding, in many cases, to be the primary fund. The same equity which in other cases makes the personal estate contribute to ease the land, as between the real and personal representatives, will here make the land relieve the personal estate. There is good sense and justice in the principle, and I feel the force of the doctrine, that it requires very strong and decided proof of intention, before the Court can undertake to shift the natural course and order of obligation between the two estates." Cumberland v. Codrington, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 229, 257, 8 AmD 501.

"The principle which may be fairly extracted from the cases may be stated thus: When the decedent has purchased an estate, subject to an incumbrance which he has promised to pay, either by express words in the deed or by a direct contract with the vendor or mortgagee, or where he has himself created the incumbrance, the incumbrance as between his heirs and personal representatives will be paid out of the personalty. But where the words in the deed or contract simply import that the decedent intended to indemnify his vendor or mortgagee against the debt, in case the real estate was not sufficient to pay it, then the incumbrance must be paid out of the realty. In the various discussions which have arisen upon this subject in England and in this country, the question of intention has always been regarded as of paramount importance in determining the primary fund for payment. Where the intention speaks through the creation of the incumbrance or a direct promise to pay it, there can, of course, be no dispute. Whatever difficulty exists in the work of reconciling decisions apparently discordant will be found to have arisen from the attempt to extract from the acts or language of the decedent a meaning which did not properly belong to them. It may be safely assumed as a rule to which there is no exception, that where an intention on the part of the decedent to make the debt his own cannot be clearly shown, the incumbrance will remain a primary charge upon the real estate." Hirst's Est., 12 Phila. (Pa.) 106, 107.

[a] Agreement to pay to vendor.—Where decedent by contract with the vendor agreed to pay the debt either to the vendor directly or some third person designated by the vendor, in discharge of the preëxisting lien on the land, the heir was entitled to have the land exonerated. O'Conner v. O'Conner, 88 Tenn. 76, 12 SW 447, 7 LRA 33.

[b] Effect of statute.—A statute making the personalty the primary fund for the discharge of "all claims against the estate of the decedent" requires satisfaction out of the personalty of a mortgage to which land was subject at the time of its conveyance to decedent, where by such conveyance he undertook to indemnify the grantor if the latter should be obliged to pay the mortgage debt. [c] Where real and personal estate are included in the same mortgage, there is nothing in the English statute to make the real estate primarily liable to bear the whole mortgage debt, but the intention of the mortgagor governs. Leonino v. Leonino, 10 Ch. D. 460; Trestrail v. Mason, 7 Ch. D. 655.

[d] Reimbursement for payments made.—Payments made by an executor in good faith and for the benefit of the persons entitled to the property may be reimbursed out of any funds in his possession belonging to such person. Matter of McKay, 33 Misc. 520, 68 NYS 925.

[e] A direction by will to convert real estate into money does not authorize the executors to pay off existing encumbrances, and if the result of such payments is disadvantageous, they are liable although they acted in good faith and in expectation of advantage to the estate. In re Gray, 27 Hun 455 [mod on other grounds 91 N. Y. 502].

[f] Testamentary provisions showing intention that executor shall pay.—Draper v. Brown, 153 Mich. 120, 117 NW 213; Sutherland v. Gesner, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 282.

The common-law rule should not be applied as between heirs or devisees and creditors, to the prejudice of the latter,[62] nor were the statutes changing the common-law rule meant to affect the rights of creditors,[63] but only to govern the rule of marshaling between the representative and the heirs or devisees.[64]

[§ 621] (3) Effect of Testamentary Directions. Where a testator has by his will given specific directions with respect to the course to be pursued in reference to encumbrances upon land, such directions must govern the action of the representative.[65]

[§ 622] c. Mortgagee as Administrator. It has been held that where a mortgagee becomes administrator of the mortgagor he is not precluded by his character as administrator from disposing of his mortgage in any manner he may deem best, and if he sells the property and gives a general warranty he does not thereby prejudice any right of the heirs to redeem, and he is not chargeable as administrator with the proceeds of the sale.[66] But it has also been held that such a mortgagee cannot exercise a power of sale in the mortgage but must pay the mortgage debt out of the personalty.[67]

[§ 623] 8. Leaseholds—a. In General. Since a lease of lands is a chattel interest going to the representative as assets,[68] it devolves upon the representative to perform the contract and he is liable for a breach of it,[69] while on the other hand he may maintain ejectment with relation to the leased lands,[70] sue for a trespass when he is in possession,[71] or sue the landlord for forcible entry and taking possession on the death of the lessee.[72] An executor cannot bind the estate by acceptance of a lease for a term of years beginning after the death of decedent,[73] and an administrator of a lessee in a lease which provides for renewal only at the option of the lessee, on a valuation of the land only, the improvements belonging to the lessee, and making no provision for compensation therefor if there was no renewal, cannot bind the estate by a renewal, so that he is properly sued personally for the rent on a lease made to him as administrator.[74]

Cropping lease. Where a lease provided that the lessor should furnish seed and implements, and the lessee labor, and the crop to be divided in certain proportions, and the lessee died after the crop was grown, but before it was gathered, the representatives of the lessee were entitled to recover on a quantum meruit the amount of the lessee's interest in the crop, less the loss or damage caused by his death.[75]

[§ 624] b. Liability for Rent. It has been laid down as the rule that the representative who takes possession under a lease to his decedent is personally liable for rent accruing,[76] at least to the

[a] Where the estate is insolvent the administrator cannot apply the personal assets to the redemption of a mortgage made by the intestate for the benefit of the widow and heirs, as the lien of the creditors upon the personal assets is paramount to the claims of the widow and heirs. Gibson v. Crehore, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 146.

[b] Application of rents and profits to mortgage debt.—Creditors cannot complain of the administrator being allowed to remain in possession, where the mortgagee permitted him to take the rents and profits for the benefit of the heirs in extinguishment of the mortgage debt, and the administrator cannot be charged with the rents and profits in his account. extent of the profits of the land,[77] and in such case the lessor has an election either to look to the estate alone or to hold the representative personally liable.[78] But where the representative has not entered or held possession after the death of the lessee, he is liable for rent only in his representative capacity and not personally,[79] and is entitled to credit in his accounts for the rent paid.[80] The representative is not relieved from liability for rent by obtaining a purchaser ready to accept an assignment of the lease, but who afterward withdrew because the lessor refused to recognize him as a tenant.[81] The goods of a deceased lessee in the hands of his administrator are not subject to distress by the lessor or his representative.[82]

Occupancy during efforts to sublet. Where the term of a lease was unexpired when the lessee died, and his widow as administratrix made all reasonable and proper efforts to sublet the premises, occupying them in the meantime, she was not chargeable in her account with rent during the time of her occupancy.[83]

[§ 625] c. Sale or Surrender of Lease. A sale of a lease or the unexpired term as a chattel interest in the representative's hands may be valid, although made without a license from the court,[84] but the representative cannot lawfully surrender the lease and take another lease in his own name.[85]

[§ 626] 9. Contracts of Decedent—a. In General. While the representative cannot as a general rule maintain an action on or perform a contract or covenant relating to real property of his decedent, since this devolves rather upon heirs or devisees,[86] he may be given ample authority by stat-

[c] When the lease is divested of its chattel qualities by statute the representative is not personally liable for rent. Gausen v. Moormann, 5 OhS&CP 287, 5 OhNP 254.

[d] Distinction depending on effectiveness of contract.—Where a decedent has hired land by contract, complete and binding at the time of his death, it is the duty of his administrator to take possession of the term as assets of his estate; and he will not be personally liable on the contract, whether or not the probate court orders him to proceed with the cultivation of the land and fulfillment of the contract. But if the contract be incomplete, and not binding at the intestate's death, and be completed by his administrator, either of his own will or by order of the probate court, the claim will be against the administrator personally and not against the estate. Yarborough v. Ward, 34 Ark. 204.

[e] Circumstances not amounting to taking possession.—Decedent's brother, his administrator, who visited his apartment to look after the personalty and with the transfer tax appraiser twice after the death, permitting decedent's widow to use the furniture, did not take possession under decedent's lease and continue in possession. [a] The representative is liable only for the real worth of the premises, and while the rent reserved by the lease is prima facie evidence of the value of the premises and the extent of the representative's liability, it is open to him to show that the estate, during the time for which he is liable, was of less value. The evidence shows that she used reasonable efforts to rent the house, and there is no evidence to the contrary. From all that appears $4,000 was not an unreasonable rental to ask for the house furnished, and there is evidence that she tried to rent it for a less amount unfurnished. By remaining in the house she was not subjecting the estate to any additional burden. The rent would have had to be paid just the same if she had moved out. "By the Maryland Code, an executor may prosecute any personal action whatever, whether at law or in equity, that the testator might have prosecuted, except an action for slander. Code of 1888, art. 93, § 104. And by § 81 of the same article, the executor of a person who shall have made sale of real estate, and has died before receiving the purchase money, or conveying the same, may convey said real estate to the purchaser, and his deed shall be good and valid in law, and shall convey all the right, title, claim, and interest of such deceased person in such real estate as effectually as the deed of the party so dying would have conveyed the same; provided, the executor of the person so dying shall satisfy the orphans' court granting him administration that the purchaser has paid the full amount of the purchase money. These seem sufficient to make out the plaintiff's case, if there were nothing more. The proviso in the Maryland statute obviously must create a condition subsequent only, as it is not to be supposed that a purchaser would pay unless he got what he paid for at the same time. In substance, the Code points out the executor as the proper person to enforce the contract, gives him a right of action to that end and empowers him to make the deed. We do not perceive how a conveyance could be questioned, if made by an executor upon a cotemporaneous payment of the price, in pursuance of a binding contract of his testator, even without obtaining antecedent authority from the orphans' court. Therefore we do not perceive why the executor is not entitled to require specific performance if he is ready to deliver a deed at the moment of receiving the price." Stewart v. Griffith, 217 U. S. 323, 351, 30 SCt 528, 54 L. ed. 782, 19 AnnCas 639 [aff 31 App. (D. C.) 29].

[a] Where the property was a homestead the heirs should be made parties, and the decree should provide that they, and not the personal representative, recover the purchase money. Solt v. Anderson, (Nebr.) 93 NW 205.

[b] Where last payment due on delivery of deed.—Where the purchasers have paid all that can be required of them before the giving of a deed for the land, and the heirs of the vendor will not give the necessary deed, the administrator of the vendor may bring a suit against the purchaser and the heirs for specific performance; and under such circumstances the tender of a deed is not a prerequisite to the bringing of the action. Wheeler v. Crosby, 20 Hun (N. Y.) 140.

suit against the personal representative for specific performance;[95] and if an action for specific performance is brought against the heirs of a deceased vendor the personal representative is a necessary party.[96] Upon the refusal of a party to convey land according to an agreement made on valuable consideration with a decedent, the personal representative of the purchaser cannot as a rule proceed to compel specific performance,[97] although he may sometimes bring an action to recover the purchase money paid by decedent[98] or damages for the breach of contract.[99] The vendor of land to a decedent who has not complied with the terms of sale has been held entitled to enforce specific performance against the purchaser's personal representative,[1] and it has also been held that an administrator who has in good faith refused to complete an executory contract of his intestate to purchase land, on which a part of the purchase money has been paid, may afterward avoid the consequences of his refusal by praying a specific performance.[2] In some states the probate court has been given jurisdiction over the specific enforcement of contracts of a decedent relative to real estate,[3] and authorized to empower the personal representative to fulfill a contract to convey

If performance is due, it is due to the heirs of the plaintiff's decedent, and not to the plaintiff. He has no interest to be vindicated, either in the title or in the possession. He does not represent the heirs. He is neither the real party in interest nor the trustee of an express trust in relation to this land. He has no interest." Carpenter v. [b] An administrator cannot join with an heir to compel the conveyance of land purchased and paid for by the decedent. McKay v. Broad, 70 Ala. 377.

Gale v. Best, 20 Wis. 44.
[b] Execution of purchase-money mortgage.—Where a purchaser paid a part of the price and agreed to secure the balance by bond and mortgage on the land, but died before executing the mortgage, the vendor could maintain a bill in equity against the purchaser's administrator to compel specific performance of the contract to execute the mortgage. [a] The power of the legislature over the succession and conveyance of land being plenary, it may provide that a court of probate shall have jurisdiction to require an executor or administrator to convey land in pursuance of the written contract or bond of his decedent. Adams v. Lewis, 1 F. Cas. No. 60, 5 Sawy. 229.
[b] Petition.—(1) A petition for an order to convey according to decedent's contract, setting it forth, and alleging a certain sum as consideration, is sufficient. In re Grogan, 38 Mont. 540, 100 P 1044 (such a petition need not negative instances in which specific performance will not lie, as specified in § 6103; and also that it sufficiently showed compliance with the agreement by petitioner, where it alleged payment of the first and second installments and readiness to pay the remainder). (2) A petition for authority to convey lands according to a contract of sale by the decedent need not set out such contract in terms; it is sufficient if the substance be stated. Carter v. Jackson, 56 N. H. 364.
[c] The petition must be verified by the affidavit of the petitioner under the Missouri statute; without such affidavit the probate court acquires no jurisdiction to make the order prayed for. Baldwin v. Whitcomb, 71 Mo. 651.
[d] Answer not amounting to application for relief.—An answer of an administrator, admitting allegations of a petition in the probate court that his intestate "acquired and held" the legal title to land "in real estate made by his decedent in his lifetime,[4] but it cannot compel him to do so unless the contract was in writing[5] and the other party has complied with its conditions.[6]

[§ 628] c. Conveyance. Ordinarily the representative has no power to execute conveyances in accordance with bonds for title or other executory contracts or covenants on the part of his decedent, this duty devolving rather upon the heir or devisee;[7] but such authority may be conferred by trust" for the petitioner, is not an application for the relief provided by the statute, empowering the probate court to decree conveyances where there were outstanding bonds, obligations, or contracts in writing for conveyances of lands by the intestate. Maxson v. Jennings, 19 Tex. Civ. A. 700, 48 SW 781.

[e] When dismissal by probate court proper.—A petition to the county court to have the executor of one bound by contract to convey real estate, but dying before making the conveyance, decreed to make the conveyance, is properly dismissed, without prejudice to petitioner's right to proceed in the circuit court, where on the hearing the right of petitioner to have specific performance is found to be doubtful, it appearing that the contract price was only a third of the value of the property at the time of the hearing, that only a third of the contract price was paid when the contract was made, and that, although the contract, which was not recorded till nine years after its execution, provided that on payment of the balance of the purchase money, evidenced by the purchaser's note payable five years after date, and payment of the taxes, or on execution and tender of a mortgage securing the balance of the purchase money, the vendor would give a deed, no payment of the note or taxes, or tender of the same or of a mortgage, was made during the life of the vendor, who died four years after the note was due, and no reasons excusing such failure to make payment or tender being disclosed. Hartshorn v. Smith, 19 S. D. 653, 104 NW 467.

[f] Presumption as to propriety of action.—Where the court records showing the evidence on which the county court acted in directing the execution of a deed by an administrator, in fulfillment of his intestate's bond for title, had been destroyed by fire, a bond for title offered in evidence, purporting to have been executed by the intestate, but differing essentially from the recitals of the judgment directing the execution of the deed, as stated therein, was insufficient to show that it was the bond on which the court acted, or rebut the presumption that the court had sufficient evidence before it on which to render the judgment on which the deed was executed. Dutton v. Wright, 38 Tex. Civ. A. 372, 85 SW 1025.

[g] Procedure on denying relief.—Where the court is not satisfied that it ought to direct the representative to execute a conveyance pursuant to his decedent's contract to convey real estate, it cannot decide against the applicant on the merits, but must dismiss the petition, leaving him to his ordinary remedy by action. Mousseau v. Mousseau, 40 Minn. 236, 41 NW 977.

[h] Construction of statute.—A statute providing that when a person who is bound by contract in writing to convey any real estate dies before making the conveyance, and in all cases where such decedent, if living, might be compelled to make such conveyance, the probate court may require his executor or administrator to convey such real estate to the person entitled thereto, does not confer jurisdiction on the probate court to direct specific performance of a parol contract by which decedent in his lifetime agreed to convey certain water rights to his wife. Bullerdick v. Hermsmeyer, 32 Mont. 541, 81 P 334 (holding also that where a decree of a probate court for specific performance of a contract by decedent in his lifetime to convey certain water rights to his wife was void for want of jurisdiction in the court at the time of its rendition, it was not validated by Sess. L. [1899] p 145, subsequently passed, to validate judicial sales by executors and administrators, etc.).

[i] An adversary proceeding is contemplated by the statute and the probate court has no jurisdiction to decree specific performance of a contract of a decedent to convey land in an ex parte proceeding, on petition of the administrator for authority to convey to which the holder of the contract is not a party. Buchanan v. Parks, (Tex. Civ. A.) 36 SW 807.

[j] Tender.—On a petition for an order to convey according to decedent's contract, it was unnecessary for petitioner to make an actual tender of the amount due, where, prior to trial, he paid it into the county treasury for the administrator's use. In re Grogan, 38 Mont. 540, 100 P 1044.

[k] Presumption in support of jurisdiction.—The probate court being a court of limited jurisdiction, where a petition filed by an administrator to enforce a contract by deceased to convey certain water rights did not show on its face that the contract was in writing, but rather implied the contrary, it could not be presumed, in support of the probate court's decree enforcing specific performance, that the contract was in writing, and that the court therefore had jurisdiction to enforce the same. Bullerdick v. Hermsmeyer, 32 Mont. 541, 81 P 334.

[l] The right of an administratrix to sue the heirs to compel them to specifically perform a contract of decedent for the sale of land is not dependent on the fact that the funds to be derived from the sale are necessary for the payment of the debts of decedent. Butman v. Butman, 213 Ill. 104, 72 NE 821 (holding also that in such a suit the administratrix may join herself in her personal right, as heir at law, as complainant, and that notice to the heirs is not required).

[m] Time for proceeding. — An agreement, supplementing a contract to convey, that on account of pendency of a suit in the federal circuit court the final payment should not be made until final determination of the suit "in said court" did not prevent the purchaser from enforcing performance before such determination, and applied to a determination in such court, and not to one on appeal; and hence a petition, after the determination, for an order requiring the vendor's administrators to convey was not premature. In re Grogan, 38 Mont. 540, 100 P 1044.

[n] Notice to persons interested (1) is necessary. Nazro v. Long, 179 Mass. 451, 61 NE 43. (2) A statute, providing that the representatives of a decedent who made a contract for the sale of land may obtain an order for a conveyance upon giving notice to the party to whom the deed is to be made, requires the service of notice on the purchaser, but does not require such service on the heirs of the deceased vendor when they refuse to convey, and the purchaser is ready and willing to perform. Butman v. Butman, 213 Ill. 104, 72 NE 821.

[o] In Texas, prior to the act of Febr. 2, 1844, the probate courts had no jurisdiction in cases for specific performance of contract. Houston v. Killough, 80 Tex. 296, 16 SW 56; Hooper v. Hall, 80 Tex. 154; McCarty v. Merry, (Civ. A.) 59 SW 304.

[p] Such a statute does not apply to a suit to compel an executrix to reconvey certain property conveyed to her testator by absolute deeds, which were in fact mortgages. Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 87 P 93.

[a] Where the purchaser has defaulted in the contract the probate judge cannot empower the administrator to execute the deed, but if the purchaser makes payments after the breach he can enforce his rights arising thereunder only by a bill in equity. Bates v. Sargent, 51 Me. 423.

7. Blake v. Lemp, (Ida.) 179 P 737, 738 [cit Cyc]; Grimmell v. Warne, 21 Iowa 11; Wollenberg v. Rose, 41 Or. 314, 68 P 804.

[a] Without adequate authority from a competent court, an executor or administrator, as such, cannot the will,[8] or by statute,[9] or order of court.[10] A deed of an executor or administrator, when the necessary authority to execute the same exists, is admissible in evidence without further proof [11] and has been held to be prima facie evidence of title in the grantee,[12] and relates back to the time of decedent's death so far as regards the capacity of the heirs to take.[13] Where an administrator's deed was executed under order of court, in fulfillment of decedent's bond for title, a subsequent objection, in trespass to try title, that the deed was invalid for failure to conform to the description of the land contained in the bond, was a collateral attack on the judgment, and unsustainable.[14] Where the representatives executed a deed as such representatives of community property of decedent and wife, reciting a decree of the probate court empowering such representatives to make title to the grantee according to a contract of deceased, and the receipt by them of the agreed consideration, it was held that, although the decree was void so that the deed was not binding on decedent's heirs, the grantee had the superior title, if decedent had contracted to convey the land to him, and he had paid the purchase money to decedent's legal representatives, of which facts the recitals in the deed as well as the fact that for sixty years thereafter no one claiming under decedent asserted claim to the land, but the grantee continuously asserted claim thereto and paid taxes thereon, were evidence.[15]

Delivery of decedent's deed. It has been held that the representative may deliver a deed executed by decedent in his lifetime upon the purchaser's compliance with his part of the contract of sale at the time stipulated,[16] although there is also authority for the contrary view.[17]

[§ 629] d. Rescission or Revival. An executor or administrator has ordinarily no authority as such to waive or rescind a contract or covenant for the sale or purchase of land made by his decedent,[18] although such a power may be exercised make a deed to real estate, but the deed must come from the heirs, to carry a good title. Wollenberg v. Rose, 41 Or. 314, 68 P 804.

[b] Administrator need not join in deed given by heirs.—Gates v. McWilliams, 6 Dana (Ky.) 42.

[c] Commissioner to sell. — The executor should file a petition for the appointment of a commissioner to make sale, where the purchaser elects to exercise an option to purchase and doubt exists as to who is to receive purchase price. Thomas v. Heddon, 186 Ind. 48, 114 NE 218.

[c] Statute permissive merely.—Chance v. Beall, 20 Ga. 142.

[d] Statute not giving authority.—The authority given an administrator by Rev. St. (1899) §§ 129, 130, 146 (Annot. St. [1906] pp 379, 380, 384), on an order to rent the land, make repairs on fences and buildings, and sell land to pay debts, does not include authority to convey in performance of a contract of decedent, and hence an administrator cannot be required to do so by decree in equity. McQuitty v. Wilhite, 218 Mo. 586, 117 SW 730, 131 AmSR 561.

[e] Circumstances not warranting conveyance.—Land purchased by a partnership was conveyed to two of the partners under an agreement in writing, to be held in trust for the use and benefit of the firm; but the deed did not purport to convey the land in trust, but to the grantees as individuals. Subsequently the partnership was incorporated. The grantees died, and an executor and son of one of them, although the will gave him no right to convey testator's real property, assumed to convey to the corporation the interest which testator took under the deed. His deed recited that testator, in conjunction with the other grantee, held the property in trust for "the copartnership . . . until a charter could be obtained for forming a joint-stock company, which was the object of such association," and that upon demand of the joint-stock company the deed was executed. Where there was nothing to show that the members of the partnership ever transferred their rights in the land to the corporation, or that they ever demanded the execution to it of the deed, the corporation could not demand the conveyance of the land to it, under a statute providing that, where a written agreement to convey land is made, and the person executing it dies before final conveyance, his personal representatives may execute the conveyance, so that the deed by the executor operated only to convey his individual interest. Byrd v. Phillips, 120 Tenn. 14, 111 SW 1109.

Shrader, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 444 (where executors are vested by will with the naked power to execute a deed, in compliance with contracts to convey entered into by the testator, and a deed is executed by them, the recital in the deed of the contract is insufficient, where the grantee seeks to assert title under it without proof of such contract).

[a] An administrator's consent to a decree of rescission in a suit brought against him and the heirs of his intestate to have a purchase of land by the intestate rescinded cannot divest the interest of the heirs; nor is such a decree authorized by the additional fact that the unpaid balance of purchase money, together

pursuant to an order of the probate court where the personal property is insufficient to pay the debts;[19] and in some jurisdictions the probate court has, under statute, power to order the rescission of such a contract under other circumstances.[20] Where a purchaser has rightfully abandoned a contract for the conveyance of land, having the right to rescind, such contract is at an end, and cannot be revived by the action of his administrator in treating it as still in force;[21] and where the administratrix of the vendor of a contract for the sale of land elects, on default of the purchaser, to declare the contract forfeited, and the purchaser acquiesces in her election, her act is binding on the estate, and a subsequent administrator cannot revoke it, except for fraud.[22] It has also been held that if decedent had the right under the contract to have the purchase money refunded because he was dissatisfied with the property, such right may be enforced by his personal representative,[23] and that a court of equity will not, after the lapse of many years, disturb a contract of rescission, on the application of the heirs of the purchaser, where the administrator acted in good faith in making such contract and it might reasonably be considered beneficial to the heirs.[24]

[§ 630] 10. Sale—a. In General—(1) Rule Stated. In the absence of some power contained in the will,[25] or of authority derived from statute[26] or an order of court,[27] neither an executor nor an administrator has any power whatever to sell the real estate of his decedent.[28] An unauthorized conwith other debts of the estate, will render it insolvent. Matthews v. Dowling, 54 Ala. 202.

[b] If the contract has been executed by a conveyance to decedent, the heirs alone have the right to rescind. Bender v. Bean, 52 Ark. 132, 12 SW 180, 241; Campbell v. Kuhn, 45 Mich. 513, 8 NW 523, 40 AmR 479.

[c] Statute not authorizing rescission. — An agreement between the administrator of the purchaser of land and the vendor for the rescission of the bond for title, an accompanying agreement for sale of timber to the vendor of the land, and certain indebtedness of the purchaser and of the administrator to the vendor, was not within a statute, authorizing administrator to compromise claims in favor of the estate, where the debtors deliver bona fide all their property for the use of creditors, except such as is exempt, and to compromise all doubtful claims belonging to the estate, where the settlement will advance the interest of those represented, provided the ordinary shall first make an order directing such compromise, and, even if it was, the compromise could not be made without an order of the ordinary having first been made. Jones v. Ragan, 136 Ga. 653, 71 SE 1098.

[d] The representative must be made a party to a bill brought by the heirs for rescission on the ground of fraud, where the death of decedent occurred before the time fixed for the conveyance or where part of the purchase money remains unpaid. "Without express or necessarily implied power, an executor has no authority to sell the real estate of a testator." Hanson v. Hanson, 149 Iowa 82, 85, 127 NW 1032, 1033.

"If no power of sale of real estate is vested in an executor by the terms of a will, he can only acquire that power from the orphans' court in such cases as the statute has authorized that court to confer the power." Morris v. Dorsey, 77 N. J. Eq. 460, 463, 77 A 44, 46 [aff 80 N. J. Eq. 555, 85 A 1134].

"The administrator, therefore, has veyance may be enjoined at the suit of heirs or devisees,[29] and a deed made by the representative without authority is void,[30] except as it may operate to pass his own interest in the land as heir or devisee,[31] and cannot affect the rights of other heirs or devisees who seasonably undertake to assert such rights.[32]

[§ 631] (2) Contract of Sale. While an unauthorized contract of sale entered into by the representative is not binding upon, and cannot be enforced against, the estate,[33] it is not necessarily void, but may bind the representative individually.[34] Where a contract for the sale of the land of a decedent is entered into by the widow and heirs, there is no such mutuality of obligation between the administrator and the purchaser as will entitle the administrator to enforce the contract.[35]

[§ 632] (3) Status of Purchaser. Although a sale by an administrator is void because made without an order of court for that purpose, yet the purchaser who goes into possession by consent of the administrator is not a trespasser, nor is he wrongfully in possession, and hence he cannot be subjected to a suit, unless he has refused to surrender possession upon demand.[36] Where a deed from an executor recited that he had power under the will to convey, although he had no such power, but both the executor and the purchaser acted in good faith, the purchaser, upon being deprived of the property, is entitled to a compensation for permanent improvements, as against which may be set off the claim of the heirs for use and occupation and for goods supplied to the purchaser, but the purchaser is not entitled to damages in addition.[37]

[§ 633] (4) Liability of Representative for Unauthorized Sale. Executors who sell without authority in the will or an order of court are bound to show the necessity of the sale and to account for the value of the property, whether such value was realized at the sale or not.[38] Where an infant has been appointed administratrix and has without authority sold real estate of decedent, he may subsequently come into court and disaffirm the contract upon the ground of fraud and minority, no duty, right, or power to sell the lands of the estate, except for the purpose, and in the manner prescribed by the statute. Unless needed for some purpose of administration, such as paying debts of the estate, the personalty being insufficient for that purpose, or unless it becomes necessary to sell for distribution among the heirs, the administrator never has any right, power, or duty, as to the land. It belongs to the heirs or devisees. In no event can the administrator, without the aid of a court of competent jurisdiction, sell or even contract to sell the lands of the estate." Creel v. [d] A military warrant or the certificate on which the warrant was obtained cannot be sold by an executor unless power is given to him by the will to do so. Ware v. Brush, 29 F. Cas. No. 17,171, 1 McLean 533 [aff 15 Pet. 93, 10 L. ed. 672].

[e] Effect of recital in order admitting will to probate.—Where an order admitting a will to probate and appointing an executor recited that the will provided that no further action should be taken by the court other than the probate of the will, the appointment of the executor, and the filing and approving of an inventory and list of claims, the recital was not a part of the judgment, and no adjudication of the executor's rights to dispose of the land of the estate without an order of court. Gray v. Russell, 41 Tex. Civ. A. 526, 91 SW 235.

[f] Assignee of representative.—Where executors have without authority carried on the business of their decedent, their assignee for the benefit of creditors has no authority to sell decedent's real estate. Matter of Praetz, 87 Misc. 128, 150 NYS 221.

[a] An option to purchase land of decedent cannot be given by the personal representative. R. O. Campbell Coal Co. v. Baker, 142 Ga. 434, 83 SE 105; Ward v. Gartside, 197 Ill. A. 314; Hedgecock v. Tate, 168 N. C. 660, 85 SE 34, AnnCas1916D 449.

[b] Contract to sell on obtaining leave of court.—A written contract, by which an administrator agrees to sell certain land of decedent for a price fixed, the conveyance to be made when the administrator shall have obtained permission of the surrogate's court, is void and not enforceable after the administrator obtains such permission. Bauman v. Goldthorpe, 129 App. Div. 19, 113 NYS 136. To same effect Logan v. Gigley, 9 Ga. 114; Bridgewater v. Brookfield, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 299.

[c] Specific performance will not be decreed against an executor who contracted for the sale of a part of the real estate of the testator, believing at the time that he had authority to sell, but who, on discovering that the will did not authorize the sale, refused to convey. Millard v. Smith, 119 Mo. A. 701, 95 SW 940. (2) Where the executrix was the sole residuary legatee of the estate, and at the time of her agreement to sell the land, the time for claims against the estate had expired, and all debts and legacies had been paid, leaving in her hands more than sufficient to close the administration, and the executrix had thus become the sole beneficial owner of the land, the contract of sale is binding on her personally and the purchaser must be regarded in equity as the real owner of the land. [§ 634] (5) Ratification of Unauthorized Sale. Where an executor conveys land without authority and receives the proceeds, a devisee who, with knowledge or notice of the substantial facts, brings suit against the executor to recover such proceeds, elects to confirm and ratify the conveyance.[40]

[§ 635] b. Statutes Authorizing or Confirming Sales. In England and Ontario the statutes have given the personal representatives of decedents the right to dispose of and deal with the real property, as if the same were personal property vested in them.[41] In the United States the various state legislatures have from time to time passed special or private acts authorizing or confirming in particular cases the sale of a decedent's real estate by his personal representative,[42] but while there are decisions upholding such acts,[43] they have been frequently declared void as involving unauthorized usurpation by the legislature of judicial functions,[44] or on other constitutional grounds.[45]

[§ 636] c. Sale under Testamentary Authority —(1) Power to Sell—(a) In General. A testator may, by his will, confer on his executor the power to sell his real estate for the payment of debts or for any other lawful purpose to which the testator wishes the proceeds of his real estate to be applied.[46] It has been said, however, that an executor derives his power to act as such in the

"I think the executors may make a good title either under the Devolution of Estates Act, R. S. O. 1897, ch. 127, secs. 4, 9, and 16, or under the Trustee Act, R. S. O. 1897, ch. 129, sec. 18. By sec. 4 of the first Act all the testatrix's property vested in the executors, subject to the payment of debts. By sec. 9, as amended by 2 Edw. VII, ch. 17, sec. 9, the executors are empowered to sell real property to the same extent as personal property, and that enables them to sell for the payment of debts. That clause is, however, subject to the other provisions of the Act, and it is contended that this power is qualified by sec. 16. I do not think so. I think this section was intended to make it clear that executors had power to sell for purposes of distribution where there were no debts as well as where there were debts; and I think the consent of the official guardian, on behalf of infants, lunatics, and non-concurring heirs or devisees, is only necessary when the sale is for the purposes of distribution only, which is not this case." Re Ross, supra.

[a] Purpose of statute.—The statute was passed to enable property which was charged with debts and legacies to be sold in any event, that is by the devisee if there was a devisee, by the executor if there was no devisee. In re Barrow-in-Furness, [1903] 1 Ch. 339.

transfer of immovable property from a compliance with the law of the place where he attempts to operate under the will and not from the will alone,[47] and the executor must take out letters testamentary in order lawfully to exercise the power which the testator has thus conferred upon him.[48] But where a testator desired that the county court assume no other control over his estate than to probate his will and record an inventory of the property, and expressly exempted the executors from giving bonds, and authorized them to sell at their discretion any of testator's land, the executors might sell without qualifying as such by giving bonds.[49] An executor's right to sell is superior to the right of partition vested in one who has purchased an undivided interest from a devisee;[50] and it is not limited because not coupled with an interest[51] or affected by the pendency of a suit by a creditor for a settlement of the estate;[52] nor is a power of sale for the purpose of paying testator's debts affected by the widow's dissent from the will.[53] A direction to an executor to sell real estate, the proceeds to become part of the residuary estate of the testator, has been held to be ineffectual as a power of sale where the will makes no disposition of the residuary estate,[54] but where a portion of a devise to executors in trust with power of sale was void because of the inability of some of the beneficiaries to take, it was held that the executors had power to sell the whole premises in order to carry out the valid portion, the heir being only entitled to her share of the proceeds of the sale in lieu of the invalid portion of the devise, as real estate, unchanged by its conversion into money.[55]

[§ 637] (b) Implied Power. It is not necessary that such settlement should not preclude the executors from administering the estate to pay debts as soon as practicable, and that their power to sell was continued until provision for the payment of testator's debts had been made, the executors had full power to sell testator's real estate to pay debts. Mersman v. Worthington, 72 SW 1094, 24 KyL 2115.

[c] Creditors of an estate by account have no right to enjoin the executrix from selling the real estate in the due course of administration, because she is insolvent, and twelve months have not elapsed since the grant of letters of administration, and because they fear that if she receives the proceeds they will lose their claims, no waste or mismanagement, or attempt thereat being alleged. Elam v. Elam, 72 Ga. 162.

[d] If the validity of the will is in controversy, and it has been admitted to probate without notice to the heirs and upon insufficient testimony, a sale of the decedent's real estate under a power contained in the alleged will may be restrained. Galbreath v. Everett, 84 N. C. 546.

[e] Provision conferring express power.—An express power of sale was held to be conferred on the executors by the following clause of the will: "I hereby direct that the place on which I live be sold as soon after my decease as the times will warrant, either publicly or privately, so as to make the best of it. Should it be thought best by my executors to divide it into small lots and sell at public sale, my will is that after the lots are tried at public sale and the amount ascertained, that the whole property be set up together and sale made in the best possible manner." Gray v. Henderson, 71 Pa. 368.

[f] Object of power must be specified.—To create a valid power of sale, it is indispensable that the object or objects to be benefited by its execution shall be specified in or be clearly ascertainable from the instrument by which the power is attempted to be created. Wisker v. Rische, 167 Mo. 522, 67 SW 218; Sweeney v. Warren, 127 N. Y. 426, 24 AmSR 468.

[a] Burden of proof as to power.—One who asserts a title to real estate based upon a purchase from executors must show that a power of sale was conferred on the executors by the will. Banks v. Johnson, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 649.

[b] Settlement of controversy between heirs.—Where a testator's will provided that his executors should have full power to sell, etc., and do everything for the benefit of the estate for the period of ten years, and a subsequent settlement of controversies between the heirs provided

[a] Where validity of alleged will in controversy.—An injunction against the sale of land is properly granted on motion of the heirs of a decedent, where the land has been advertised under a power contained in an instrument purporting to be a will, which has been admitted to probate without notice to the heirs and upon insufficient testimony, and the validity of which is in controversy. Galbreath v. Everett, 84 N. C. 546.

[b] Power pending caveat to will.—Under a statute declaring that all acts done by any executor "according to law," before any revocation of his letters, shall be valid, and providing that, on the court deciding against the probate of a will, the letters testamentary shall be revoked, and the power of the party under the letters shall cease, the power of an executor continues, notwithstanding the actual filing of a caveat to revoke the probate of the will, and a sale by an executor under a power in the will, made before the filing of the caveat, although not ratified until thereafter, is valid, such being an "act done according to law." Pacy v. Cosgrove, 113 Md. 315, 77 A 1114.

[c] If the legal estate is devised to the executors merely for the purpose of sale and conveyance, they may make the conveyance in order to fulfill the trust imposed on them, and it is not absolutely necessary that they should qualify fully as executors. An executor can account for proceeds of the sale of lands not devised to him in trust only when he has sold them pursuant to a power of sale contained in the will, and it is not conceivable that the results of a sale for which there is no valid warrant in the will became any part of the fund intrusted to him as executor. "An executor has implied authority to sell the real estate of the testator whenever it appears from the whole purview of the will to have been his intention that it should be sold and the proceeds applied to the purposes to which the executor alone may apply them. As a general rule an executor takes a power of sale by implication only when it is necessary in order to carry out the provisions of the will, and not merely because it would be of advantage to the real estate. Where a testator directs the payment of debts and legacies with the proceeds of real estate, or otherwise manifests an intent that the proceeds of the real estate should be so used, the executor takes a power of sale by implication; but a power of sale is not implied solely from a direction that the executor pay debts and legacies. A power of sale is also implied where real estate is devised to the executor for any purpose which is within the scope of his functions as such, or which require a sale, or where the residue is devised to him after direction to pay debts. But the executor does not take an implied power of sale where land is devised to another after payment of the testator's debts." Jacksonville First Baptist Church v. "The general rule is that if a sale of the real estate is necessary to carry out the purposes of the testator, the power to make the sale will be given by implication, as otherwise the intention of the testator might be defeated. In those cases it will be presumed that the testator, having in view a duty imposed upon the executors of his will, intended that tney should sell his real estate, and omitted, through mistake or otherwise, to confer express power." Livingston v. Murray, 39 HowPr (N. Y.) 102, 103.

"If a sale of the real estate is necessary to carry out the purposes of the testator, the power to make the sale will be given by implication, as otherwise the intention of the testator might be defeated." Chandler v. Thompson, 62 N. J. Eq. 723, 726, 48 A 583.

See also Anthony v. Rees, 2 Cromp. & J. 75, 83, 149 Reprint 31 ("It is clear, that we are bound to look at all the parts of the will, to see whether a provision which may at first appear absolute, be not qualified by some subsequent clause").

"No precise form of words is necessary to the creation of a power; if the intention to confer the power is apparent, to enable the executor to execute the trusts of the will, the power will be implied." Winston v. Jones, 6 Ala. 550, 554 [quot Blount v. Moore, 54 Ala. 360]. To same effect Hardeman v. Hardeman, (Ala.) 79 S 356.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) A clause in the will, "I hereby desire that my executor sell," impliedly confers power to sell. Herb v. Walther, 6 Pa. Dist. 687. (2) Where testator devised all his estate in trust for the purpose of continuing his business, it converted all the real and personal property not already invested in the business so as to be available as business capital at the discretion of the trustees, and a power to sell the real estate was therefore necessarily implied. Matter of O'Reilly, 59 Misc. 136, 112 NYS 208. (3) Where a will authorizes the executor to invest, manage, and control the estate according to his best judgment, in order to combine safety and productiveness, the executor is authorized to contract for the sale of unproductive real estate. Sargent v. Sibley, 8 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 434, 8 CincLBul 6. (4) Where a testator, by his will, gives his executors power to do any and everything with his property that he could have done during his life, the executors have power to execute a deed confirming a deed given by their testator, but lost before registration. Coal Creek Consol. Coal Co. v. East Tennessee Iron, etc., Co., 105 Tenn. 563, 59 SW 634. (5) Where a will directs payment of all the testator's just debts and funeral expenses and devises "all the rest, residue, and remainder" of the estate to the executor, in trust, etc., the executor has an implied power of sale for the purpose of paying the debts. Coogan v. Ockershausen, 55 N. Y. Super. 286, 18 NYSt 366. (6) An intent on the part of the testator that his executor should sell the real estate was shown by the following provision of the will: "I give and bequeath all the residue of my estate, both real and personal, of whatever name or nature soever, or wherever said property may be found, to the cause of Christ, for the benefit and promotion of true evangelical piety and religion. And I do order and direct my executor hereafter named and appointed to collect all the above last specified property, as soon as can be done consistently without sacrificing too much by forcing the sale thereof in an improper manner." Going v. Emery, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 107, 26 AmD to extract such a power from it when the testator's intention to give or the necessity for such a power is not clear.[58] So, the mere fact that a sale would be beneficial to the estate is not sufficient to raise an implied power of sale, where this is not necessary to carry out the provisions of the will.[59] A power of sale is implied where the residue after the payment of debts is devised to the executor,[60] but it is otherwise where such residuary devise is to a person other than the executor,[61] and no power of sale can be implied from the mere fact that the bequests under the will exceed the amount of the testator's personalty.[62] A power of sale is implied where land is devised to the executor for purposes naturally devolving upon him[63] or requiring a sale;[64] and it has been considered that the use of terms applicable to personalty particularly and exclusively indicates that all the property is to be converted into personalty and gives an implied power of sale.[65] A power of sale is not implied solely from a general direction to pay debts,[66] but where a testator directs the payment of debts and legacies with the proceeds of real estate, or otherwise manifests an intent that the proceeds of his real estate should be so used, the executor takes

(7) Where a will directs the sale of lands and the division of the proceeds among designated persons, the executor is charged by law with the duty of applying the fund produced by the sale to the payment directed to be made by the will, and is vested by implication of law with the power to sell the land, although not expressly authorized by the will. Lash v. Lash, 209 Ill. 595, 70 NE 1049. (8) Where land was devised to certain children with the direction that the testatrix's father should receive a given amount of money out of the land, a power in the executor to sell the land arises by implication. In re Walsh, 144 NYS 442. (9) Where, under a will, it is the duty of executors to collect outstanding accounts and pay all indebtedness of the estate, they may, if necessary, sell the whole or a part to pay the indebtedness, and convey a good, marketable title upon confirmation of sale by the probate court. Jones v. Broadbent, 21 Ida. 555, 123 P 476. (10) Where less than a month elapsed between the date of the execution of the will and the death of the testatrix, and the inventory disclosed the value of the real estate to be largely in excess of the personal property, and that testatrix more than exhausted her personal property by pecuniary legacies, the presumption arises that testatrix knew the personal property was insufficient to pay the pecuniary legacies provided for in the will. Thissell v. Schillinger, 186 Mass. 180, 71 NE 300. (11) A provision in a will, in relating to certain real estate that "I desire held by my executor until such a time as he deems prudent to sell so as to avoid forced sale, and in order to realize as much as possible out of said real estate, provided the time shall not exceed ten (10) years after my death," grants to the executor power to sell and convey. Niquette v. Green, 81 Kan. 569, 571, 106 P 270. (12) An executor in a will devising real estate to testator's wife for life, and declaring that after her death it shall be sold, and the proceeds equally divided between his children living at that time, has implied power to sell and distribute the proceeds among the children, but no trust is created or required in order to sell. Williams v. Williams, 152 App. Div. 323, 136 NYS 990. (13) A power of sale may be implied, from a power to manage the estate to the best advantage for the benefit of creditors. Carlton v. Goebler, 94 Tex. 93, 58 SW 829.

[b] Devise of land to be sold for division. — "The general rule undoubtedly is that, where land is devised to be sold for division among the heirs or devisees, without more, the executor is without power to convey (Council v. Averett, 95 N. C. 131); but the rule yields when a contrary intention appears from the terms of the will, and we are of opinion that the modification of the rule should prevail in the present case. The will disposes of a large real and personal estate, including the land in controversy, and directs very generally a sale of the same for division among the heirs, legatees, etc., chiefly among his four children, and concludes with the provision appointing the executors: 'To all intents and purposes to execute this my last will and testament according to the true intent and meaning of the same and every part and clause thereof.' A clause of this character was held to confer on an executor the power to sell realty in Saunders v. Saunders, 108 N. C. 327, 12 SE 909, and the authority is decisive of the question presented by this exception." Roper Lumber Co. v. Swain, 161 N. C. 566, 567, 77 SE 700.

a power of sale by implication.[67] A charge of debts on the realty implies, according to the English decisions, a power of sale,[68] but the view prevailing in the United States is that such a charge is not, of itself, sufficient to raise an implied power of sale.[69] A mere direction to distribute or divide an estate consisting in whole or in part of realty is not of itself sufficient to raise an implied power of sale,[70] but it is otherwise where a sale is necessary to effect a distribution, or the testator apparently contemplated that a sale should be made for that purpose;[71] and a fortiori, a will directing that testator's real estate shall be converted into money and that his executor shall distribute his estate among named beneficiaries empowers the executors to sell the real estate.[72] So also, a power of sale is implied where the testator blends the proceeds of real estate into one fund with the personalty for the purpose of distribution or accumulation or even where there is no direction to distribute.[73] A devise to an executor with directions to invest and pay over the income is generally held to give him implied power to sell real estate so devised in order to carry out the will;[74] but it

[a] Illustrations.—(1) A will directing the executors to "divide" and distribute among testator's heirs and next of kin all the residue of his estate, consisting of both real and personal property, after providing for certain legacies, imposed on the executors the duty to divide and distribute the property, real and personal, and necessarily gave them the power to sell the property for that purpose, charging them with an active trust. McLaughlin v. Greene, 198 Mass. 153, 83 NE 1112. (2) The testator, by his will, gave to his wife a life estate in one-third part of his land, and a fifth part of his estate absolutely. He then recited that he had given to his daughter S certain property in trust which he estimated at one dollar, and provided as follows: "It is my will and desire that after the payment of all my just debts, and allotting to my wife her portion, as hereinbefore directed, to add to the residue of my estate of every description the said sum of one dollar value of property, conveyed in trust for the use of my daughter S, and to divide the sum total after making such addition into seven parts; and I do hereby direct and require my executors, hereinafter named, to distribute and pay over the residue of my estate, both real and personal, in the following manner, to wit: after deducting from one of said seven parts the said sum of one dollar, conveyed for the use of my daughter, S, to pay over to said trustees the residue of said portion, to be held by them in like trust, for her use and benefit of her and her heirs, and to pay to . . . [each of the testator's other six children] one seventh part of the residue of my estate as aforesaid, or to their legal representatives respectively." It was held that the executors were given power by the will to sell the lands of the testator to enable them to make distribution. Winston v. Jones, 6 Ala. 550 ("the terms 'add to' and 'divide into seven parts' necessarily imply that there was some fund, similar in kind, with which the addition could be made, and which, when added to, would be susceptible of division into parts. But how could money be added to land, and the product be divided into equal parts? Again, these parts so obtained are to be paid over to the legatees severally. The use of these terms is quite persuasive that the prevailing idea in the testator's mind was that of a sum of money which might be added to, divided, and paid over"). (3) Where after bequeathing a pecuniary legacy, and directing its investment, a testator provided as follows: "I will and bequeath all the remainder of any property in lands, . . . together with chattels, stock, shares, furniture and personal effects, to my brothers and sisters, or their representatives in equal shares," and after naming the beneficiaries and indicating their shares, appointed two persons who were not beneficiaries under his will "to be my executors, to carry out the intention of this my last will and testament," the executors were given an implied power of sale over the real estate. Carlisle v. Cooke, [1905] 1 Ir. 269.

[c] Sale to prevent loss.—A will conferring power on the executor to sell the property of the estate in case it cannot be divided in kind authorizes a sale of land which would lose in value if thus divided. Offutt v. Hall, 87 SW 785, 27 KyL 1072.

is always a question of the intention of the testator, and if from the general tenor of the will it appears that it was not intended by such direction to give power to the executor to sell, none will be implied.[75] Where there is an express devise of land to persons named in the will, there can be no power of sale in the executor by implication,[76] and even a charge of legacies on land devised beneficially does not give the executor any power of sale.[77] An unexecuted parol agreement to convey land creates against the promisor no debt or liability for the payment of which his executor will have implied power to sell land belonging to the estate.[78]

[§ 638] (c) Construction of Power. A court of probate jurisdiction may construe a power of sale given to an executor.[79] The law of the testator's domicile, rather than the law of the state where the land is located, governs in the construction of such a power,[80] and it should receive a liberal construction in order to effect the true purpose and intent of the testator.[81]

[§ 639] (d) Extent of Power; Purpose of Sale. It is usually considered that, where executors are given a general power of sale, they may sell at their discretion, as prudence may dictate, during the continuance of the trust, and are not limited to a sale for purposes of administration,[82] although they must not act arbitrarily or capriciously in

Cook v. Cook, (N. J. Ch.) 47 A 732. (2) An executor, to whom all of the testator's residuary estate is devised, "in trust to receive, hold, invest and reinvest," has by implication power to sell real estate to the end that he may discharge the trust. [a] Illustrations.—(1) A testator devised to his executors all the residue of his estate real and personal with power to sell, and directed them to divide it into four shares, three of which they were to pay over to three of the testator's children named in the will. The fourth share the executors were directed to "hold, retain, invest, and keep invested" for the testator's other child, Mrs. Paret, and to "collect and receive and pay or apply the rents, interest, and income arising therefrom" to her use for life. By the second codicil to the will the executors were directed to deduct from such fourth share the amount of the indebtedness to the testator of the beneficiary's husband, and the residue of such share was directed to be "held and invested and kept invested" for her by the executors, "who shall collect and pay or apply the interest and income thereof" to her use during her life. It was held that the direction to "invest and keep invested" the share of the fourth child did not authorize the executors to sell that part of the real estate which had been set apart as her share, but that it applied only to so much of that share as consisted of personalty. Cruikshank v. Parker, 51 N. J. Eq. 21, 26 A 925 [rev on other grounds 52 N. J. Eq. 310, 29 A 685]. (2) A direction to the executors to invest two thirds of the testator's estate, and to use the interest and so much of the principal as might be necessary for the education and maintenance of the testator's children, did not give the executors power by implication to sell the real estate. Offutt v. Hall, 87 SW 785, 27 KyL 1072. [b] Where the testator gave his executors "full power to sell and convey any part or all of my real estate and personal property, and to reinvest the proceeds thereof in such manner as they may think to be for the best interests of my estate," the power was not restricted by implication to sales for investment, but was a general power, and authorized a sale for purposes of distribution as directed by the will. [d] Independent executor.—Where a will declared that it was the wish of testatrix that the court should have no control over the estate except to probate the will and cause the executor to return an inventory, and empowered the executor to gather and collect all the property, collect all the debts, sell and convey any property, etc., he had power, without an order of court, to convey land belonging to the estate in payment for services rendered to him as executor. Baker v. Hamblen, (Tex. Civ. A.) 85 SW 467.

[e] Sale must be in usual course of administration.—Clark v. Clark, 172 Ill. 355, 50 NE 101.

[f] Mere authority as distinguished from direction.—Where a will authorized the executors to sell realty, but did not absolutely direct a conversion, and the estate was solvent, and there was no necessity to sell realty, an executor's power of sale was limited to the ordinary purposes incident to settling the estate. Kreise v. Cartledge, 262 Pa. 55, 104 A 855; Schenck v. Clyde, 53 Pa. Super. 652, 654 ("It will be observed the will of the testatrix worked no conversion. It contains no absolute direction to sell. It simply invests her executor with power to make a sale of the real estate 'for the payment of my debts or for any other purpose.' The will creates no trust to be carried out by the executor other than the ordinary one imposed upon every executor or administrator to settle the estate according to law. As there were no debts, there was no occasion for any execution of the

the matter.[83] If, however, the power is limited, it can be exercised only under the circumstances, for the purposes, and in the manner provided for or contemplated in the will.[84] Thus, where the executor is given power to sell if necessary for certain purposes, the necessity must appear in order to uphold a sale,[85] but where the power is to sell if, in the opinion of the executor, it is necessary for a particular purpose, the conveyance is conclusive and the necessity need not be shown.[86] Where a will which made no disposition of the personal estate, and had no residuary clause, contained the following provision: "I authorize my executor to sell and convey," certain land "for the purpose of discharging all my debts," the direction did not indicate an intention that the personalty should be relieved from its primary liability for the payment of the debts, and therefore the executor could not sell it to the widow when they both knew that there was more than enough personalty to pay the debts.[87] If the consent of a majority of the persons interested in the estate is required before a power of sale can be exercised, and some are dead, the consent of a majority of the entire original number is still necessary.[88] Where testator directed his "executrix" to sell his property and in subsequent clause appointed his wife executrix, the wife had no power in her individual capacity power for the purpose of paying them. It is true, the power conferred is without any express limitation of time within which it should be exercised. It must also be agreed that the language quoted defining the purposes for which the power might be lawfully exercised is general. But it does not follow from these facts that the executor named in the will, or a succeeding administrator de bonis non, might, at any indefinite time, after the death of the testatrix, sell and convey the property without any regard to the nature of the power conferred and the purposes for which it should be exercised. The power conferred must necessarily be construed in the light shed by the will on the purpose of the testatrix in conferring it. To the payment of her debts, of course, her property was legally devoted, and she might well empower her executor to sell her real estate for such purpose. Her expression 'or for any other purpose' must be construed in the light of the more specific purpose named. In other words, it would be for the purpose of executing her will. Beyond that he had nothing to do. To undertake to exercise such power for a purpose wholly foreign to any contemplated by the testatrix, according to her will, would be unwarranted").

On failure to take the farm, the executors were authorized to sell it, and to distribute the proceeds as provided in the will. He further directed that the estate not specially devised should be divided among his children. Without any sale of the coal, and without any appraisement, the executors executed to a railroad company a right of way through the farm. It was held, that the sale would be enjoined at the suit of the other children, as there was no authority under the will to make a sale for such purpose. McClane v. McClane, 207 Pa. 465, 56 A 996.

[c] What provisions of will govern.—Where a will provided that a specific piece of realty should be sold to create a fund for the necessities of testator's widow, and to pay a legacy, the realty, if unsold on the death of the widow because such sale was unnecessary, fell into the residue with other unsold property, under a clause of the will directing a sale after the widow's death of all the remaining real estate for certain specified purposes, and was controlled as to the manner of sale and distribution of the proceeds by the provisions of the latter clause. Trask v. Sturges, 170 N. Y. 482, 63 NE 534.

[d] Injunction against sale.—Grantees of devisees of land may enjoin the executrix from exercising her power to sell such land for payment of debts of the testator, which are barred by limitation, such debts constituting no claim against the estate, and it being the executrix's duty to set up the bar. Butler v. Johnson, 111 N. Y. 204, 18 NE 643 [aff 41 Hun 206].

[e] What constitute "claims and demands."—Testator bequeathed all his property to executors, in trust to accumulate rents and profits until the remarriage or death of the widow, and not to dispose of the same until the happening of either of such events, "except as hereinafter provided." By the second clause he directed payment of all claims and demands on or against his estate, and then a division of rents and profits among his wife and children. By the sixth clause he conferred power on the executors to pay all encumbrances, "claims, and demands" against his estate, to raise money thereon and execute conveyances necessary in their judgment for the best interests of the estate, and to sell at either public or private sale. That the term "claims and demands," as so used, included a liability to repair tenement buildings belonging to the estate in accordance with directions of the tenement house department, and that the executors, therefore, having no available funds to make such repairs, had power to sell the property before the repairs were made by the department, at its expense, for the benefit of the estate. [b] Power to sell for purpose of executing will.—In the absence of any necessity to sell testator's real estate, the executors could not make title under a will declaring, "I hereby authorize and empower my executors to sell all, or any part of my estate, real or personal, not herein specifically bequeathed or devised, either at public or private sale, and to execute and deliver good and sufficient deeds for all real estate sold, for the purpose of executing this will." Eberly v. Koller, 209 Pa. 298, 58 A 558.

[c] Power to sell for best interest of estate.—Where a power of sale was given by will to the executrix as such, and embraced only the right to make a sale for the best interests of the estate, it was a mere naked power to carry out the purposes of the will, and could not be used to divest the estates of devisees, unless such exercise was necessary in the execution of such purposes. Cowell v. South Denver Real Est. Co., 16 Colo. A. 108, 63 P 991.

to sell for her own use.[89]

[§ 640] (e) Discretionary or Mandatory Power; Compelling Exercise. The power of sale may be either discretionary or mandatory;[90] that is, the testator may give his executor the power to make a sale but leave it to the discretion of the executor whether the power shall be exercised,[91] or impose upon the executor an absolute duty to sell, leaving him no discretion whatever in the matter.[92] Although an executor who has a discretionary power of sale may go into court for direction and guidance in the matter,[93] unless he does so of his own accord, the courts will not as a rule interpose to control him in an honest exercise of a discretion or a power with regard to the sale of decedent's real estate vested in him by the will;[94] but it would seem that if the circumstances are such that a refusal to sell amounts to an abuse of discretion the court may interfere.[95] In the case of a mandatory direction, it is well settled that if the executor neglects or refuses to sell, the court will compel him to do so at the instance of an interested person.[96]

Bunner v. Storm, 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 357. (2) A will devised specified property to testator's children for life, with remainder to the grandchildren. Item twelve directed the executors after two years to sell, if deemed compatible with the interest of the children, all lands on such terms as they think best. The same item directed one half the proceeds of such sales to be paid to the children in cash and the other half, if not consumed in making certain specified payments, to be invested in productive property, and to be held by the children under the limitations and conditions before set forth. Item thirteen provided that the residue of the personalty should be sold, and the proceeds, together with the proceeds of all other property not before disposed of, invested in productive property, to be held as provided by item twelve. Item fifteen declared that the property devised and bequeathed to testator's children, with the exception of a special legacy to each and one half the proceeds of the lands which the executors were by item twelve authorized to sell, was devised and bequeathed to the children for life, with remainder to the grandchildren. That item twelve, when considered in connection with the other provisions of the will, gave the executors discretion to sell the residue lands, but did not require them to make such sale. Ross v. Roberts, 2 Hun 90, 4 Thomps. & C. 318 [aff 63 N. Y. 652]. (2) A residuary bequest to executors, "in trust, nevertheless, and I . . . authorize my executors . . . to rent, sell, or dispose of the rest . . . of my said real estate . . . and to place the residue of the money . . . arising from such sale or sales" at interest for the support of minor heirs, creates an imperative power to dispose of the residuary estate. Brown v. Doherty, 185 N. Y. 383, 78 NE 147, 113 AmSR 915 [aff 93 App. Div. 190, 87 NYS 563]. (3) Where testator devised the use of certain of his real estate to his son and his wife for life, to be sold at their death, and the proceeds divided among the son's children, and also provided that in case the son and his wife elected not to reside on the property, or refused to pay taxes or make repairs thereon, the executor was authorized to sell the same and invest the proceeds for the benefit of the son and his wife for life, and after their death to divide the same among the son's children, the will contained a mandatory direction to the executor to sell the property on the refusal of the son and his wife to pay taxes and make repairs thereon. Ayers v. Courvoisier, 101 App. Div. 97, 91 NYS 549.

[b] Discretion merely as to time and manner of sale.—Where testator made specific devises of his real estate, and also directed the sale of a portion, and division of the proceeds among named beneficiaries, a subsequent provision of the will appointing executors to dispose of his property "as they think best" merely vested in the executors a discretion as to the time and manner of selling the property he had directed sold. Thompson v. Thompson, 87 SW 790, 27 KyL 949.

(2) So an imperative power in executors to sell the residue of the estate, "as soon as practicable . . . having in mind the interest of all concerned," does not warrant its compulsory ex-

[§ 641] (f) Control of Courts.[97] Where a power of sale is given to the executor, he may proceed to sell the realty without recourse to the courts for a license,[98] and it is also held that, where the will gives power to the executor to sell land in case of a deficiency of assets, he must sell under the power and not under the statute authorizing sales by leave of the probate court.[99] But where the will, although empowering the executor to sell, declares that this power is subject to an order of court first being had, the executor cannot convey land without confirmation by the court of his contract of sale.[1] A void sale under order of court cannot be supported as an exercise of a power of sale under the will.[2]

[§ 642] (g) Powers Incidental to Power of Sale—aa. In General. Where the title to land, as well as a power of sale, is given to executors, it is held that they can make an agreement to assign a part to the widow for dower, in consideration of her releasing the residue, which, in the absence of collusion, will bind the heirs as well as creditors.[3] And it has been considered that the executor may also, as incidental to the power of sale, create easements, such as the right to use part of the property as a street, when the most advantageous mode of exercising the power is by dividing the property into building lots.[4] But a will authorizing execuercise, although three years have elapsed, although the land could be sold "without difficulty" and although the executors have refused to sell to beneficiaries at the "fair and reasonable value" of the property, the will permitting purchase at the market value at testator's death as valued by the executors. Walbridge v. Brooklyn Trust Co., 143 App. Div. 502, 128 NYS 686.

[c] Jurisdiction of orphans' court to hold executor to account.—Under the act of June 16, 1836, § 19, extending the jurisdiction of the orphans' court to all cases wherein executors may be in any way accountable for their testator's property, the orphans' court has exclusive jurisdiction to hold an executrix to account for the performance of a testator's trust vested in her to sell land. Erie Dime Sav., etc., Co. v. Vincent, 105 Pa. 315.

[d] Parties to action to compel sale.—A will gave testator's widow the family residence and one third of his personalty in satisfaction of her dower and thirds. After various other bequests, he provided for conversion and distribution of the residue among his children. The will empowered the executors to manage the estate until such conversion. Another clause provided for the widow's support until the distribution by way of advancement. The widow's executor is not a proper party to a suit to compel the executors to sell the lands and distribute the proceeds. Walbridge v. Brooklyn Trust Co., 143 App. Div. 502, 128 NYS 686.

Tex.—Dean v. Furrh, 58 Tex. Civ. A. 495, 124 SW 431.

"Whenever an executor has a power under a will to sell real estate, no license of any court is necessary to, or can give any additional validity to, any sale and conveyance which he may make. And it is considered a good reason, for refusing such license, that the power already exists." Going v. Emery, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 107, 26 AmD 645.

[a] An adjudication as to the insufficiency of the personal assets to meet debts and legacies is not a necessary preliminary to the exercise of a power of sale, conferred by the will, by the executor or an administrator with the will annexed. Bull v. Bal, 17 N. M. 466, 130 P 251.

[b] Effect of seeking aid of court in other matters.—When an executor or administrator with power under a will to sell an estate institutes an action asking the aid of the court with reference to any matter connected with the settlement of the estate, he does not by that act turn over to the court exclusive charge of the whole estate, and thus lose all power and control over it; and hence an action for settlement does not prevent an administrator with the will annexed from selling land belonging to the estate under a power conferred by the will. Harding v. Weisiger, 109 SW 890, 33 KyL 170.

[c] Bond.—A statute requiring persons licensed by the probate court to give bond before proceeding to make sales of real estate does not apply to an executor who makes a sale of real estate in execution of the power vested in him by the will. Bradt v. Hodgdon, 94 Me. 559, 48 A 179.

[d] Interposition of claim by third persons.—The statute with reference to the interposition of claims by third persons to arrest the sale of land by executors or administrators limits the right to cases where the sale is proceeding under an order of court or where proceedings are being taken in court for legal authority to make a sale and does not apply in case of a sale by an executor under power contained in the will. Harwell v. Foster, 102 Ga. 38, 28 SE 967.

[e] Substituted administrator.—Although an executor is entitled under a will to exercise a power of sale without judicial approval, a substituted administrator must procure approval. Randall v. Gray, 80 N. J. Eq. 13, 83 A 482.

[f] In Vermont, on the other hand, it is held that even though the testator by his last will authorized his executrix to sell his land without the consent of any person or court, that does not authorize her to sell land for the payment of debts without leave of the probate court, for the statutes create a complete system of probate procedure; and, while, under Pub. St. § 2889, the court will, if possible, give effect to the desires of the testator as to what lands shall be sold for debts, that does not deprive it of the custody of the estate, and an executor, if it is necessary to sell lands to pay debts, must do so in accordance with Pub. St. § 2888, declaring that they may be sold by license of the probate court for the payment of debts, for all estates are settled as insolvent estates. Wetmore, etc., Co. v. Bertoli, 87 Vt. 257, 88 A 898.

[a] Reason for rule.—"It would seem to be unjust, unreasonable and improper for the court to permit such a proceeding, as it could benefit no one, and would be burdening the estate with expenses to the injury of those interested. Why should it confer a power with which the executors have already been clothed by the will? If they were to sell under that power, they could bring the proceeds into court, under the provisions of the Code, and they would be distributed as if they were derived from such a sale as the petitioners here seek." "The authority given to them to sell it was of a broad and unlimited character, allowing that to be done as their judgment might indicate it to be proper and advantageous to his estate. The property was valuable for the occupancy and use of persons desiring to improve it. It was situated in that part of the city where it was available to be built upon, and it could be sold for that purpose only by providing some means of access to it. If the lots had been conveyed without the advantages of a street in front of them, they would evidently have been of much less value than if that means of approach and enjoyment were provided; a proper sale of property of this description necessarily includes the power to provide some means of ingress and egress to and from it, and that in such a locality can be used as well by the owners as by all other persons passing in the vicinity. In no other way can the proper advantage of this nature of property be acquired or enjoyed by the purchaser." Matter of Sixty-seventh St., 60 HowPr (N. Y.) 265, 270.

[a] Contrary view.—In England, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, an executor or administrator who has no estate or interest in the land, but only a power to sell it, is not empowered to grant an easement over it. In re Barrow-in-Furness, [1903] 1 Ch. 339.

tors to sell and convey the coal underlying certain of the testator's lands, with the usual mining privileges, does not give them power to waive or release the right of surface or lateral support.[5] An unrestricted power of sale does not authorize a confession of judgment.[6]

[§ 643] bb. Contracts of Sale; Options. Where the will directs an executor to sell property with discretion as to terms and conditions, he has power to make a contract of sale and to enforce specific performance thereof,[7] and a contract of sale may be enforced against him.[8] But an executor who is empowered to sell cannot give an option on the property.[9]

[§ 644] cc. Exchanges. A mere power to sell given to an executor does not authorize him to exchange the land, either in whole or in part, for other land,[10] and consequently a contract of sale by which the executor agrees to accept other land in part payment, at a stipulated price, is void.[11] But where a testator expressly impresses the character of realty upon the proceeds of sale of his real estate during the existence of a life estate given by the will, and expressly confers power upon his executor to sell his real estate and with the proceeds purchase other real estate and to continue the transfer and disposition thereof in his discretion, this power authorizes a direct exchange.[12]

[§ 645] (h) Revocation or Termination of Power. A power of sale is not revoked by a subsequent contract made by the testator to sell the land,[13] by a codicil substituting other executors for those named in the will,[14] by a final order settling the estate and discharging the executor,[15] by the subsequent birth of issue not provided for by the will,[16] or by the remarriage of the widow and executrix.[17] Neither does the death of the sole beneficiary under a will, before the executor has sold property of the estate to pay the debts, as directed by the will, deprive the executor of that power.[18] Where a will directed a sale of all the real and personal estate of testatrix by the administrator for the benefit of a devisee, a further provision directing the interest and rents of the property to be used for the maintenance and education of the devisee did not abrogate the direction to the administrator to sell, since by the word "rents" the testatrix meant that, so long as the real estate remained unsold, the income arising therefrom, as well as the interest from the proceeds of the personal estate, should be applied to the support and education of the devisee.[19] But if a sale is directed for a specified purpose, the power to sell terminates with the purpose for which it was created;[20] and where the testator directs realty to be sold by his executor and the proceeds divided, the power becomes inoperative if the beneficiaries under the will elect to take the property as realty and retain it without conversion.[21] It has been held that a

[a] Judgment to be rendered.—In an action by the executor for specific performance judgment can be entered that defendant specifically perform, and if he refuses to do so that the property be sold by a referee, whose deed to the purchaser will convey all the title to the premises which the executor could have conveyed under the power in the will. Strauss v. Bendheim, 162 N. Y. 469, 56 NE 1007 [rev 44 App Div. 82, 60 NYS 398 (rev 28 Misc. 660, 59 NYS 1054)].

Ward v. Barrows, supra.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Where the will provided for the sale of all the testator's real estate and gave the widow the interest on one third of the proceeds, and the widow renounced the provision of the will and claimed dower, the executor had no right to sell, because the power was given in the expectation that the widow would accept and abide by the provisions made for her in the will, and with the purpose and intent that the land should be sold free from encumbrance and the proceeds of the sale disposed of as directed by the will. Snider v. Snider, 3 W. Va. 200. (2) On the death of the widow, to provide for whose support a power of sale was given to the executor, the purpose and with it the power cease to exist. Fidler v. power to sell with the consent of a designated person terminates on the death of such person without having consented,[22] although it is otherwise where it is apparent that the intention of the testator was merely to require the consent of such person if living, and to continue the power after his death,[23] or that the requirement of such consent was subordinate to the principal purpose and intention of the will.[24] A discretionary power conferred upon executors jointly has been held to terminate with the death of one of them.[25] A power of sale given to an executor virtute officii ceases on the termination of his duties as executor, and cannot afterward be exercised by him, although he continues to act under the will as trustee.[26]

[§ 646] (i) Effect of Partial Invalidity of Devise in Trust to Sell. Where real estate is devised to executors in trust to sell and distribute the proceeds among designated beneficiaries, and a share thereof passes to testator's heirs by reason of the invalidity of the devise of that share, the whole property is subject to the exercise of the power of sale, provided a sale is necessary to carry out to the best advantage the valid provisions of the will.[27]

[§ 647] (2) Who May Exercise Power[28]—(a) In General. It is axiomatic that, where a testator authorizes or directs his executor to sell his real property, the executor is the proper person to make the sale,[29] although he has not power to sell after

[a] Necessity for unanimous concurrence; time of election.—Where a will devised the residue of testator's estate to three persons named, and appointed one of them excutor, with an express power of sale as to all the "real estate herein devised," such power of sale could not be defeated by the election of the devisees to take the subject of the devise in kind, unless all of them concurred, and the election was exercised before sale. 24. Wisker v. Rische, 167 Mo. 522, 532, 67 SW 218 ("The will required the consent of the son and daughter of the testatrix to the sale. But this was clearly a subordinate requirement and idea to the principal purpose and intention of the will to provide homes for her children, and to pay her debts out of the residue of her property. The primary object and intention of the testatrix should not be allowed to fail because her secondary and subordinate intention had become impossible of fulfillment on account of the death of the son, whose consent to the sale was prescribed. To hold that the son's death, before the sale, had the effect to vitiate and annul the power, would not only pro tanto have the effect of holding that the testator died testate but became intestate thereafter by the subsequent death of her son, so far as the residue of her estate is concerned, but would also defeat the dominant scheme and controlling policy of the whole will. Such a narrow and destructive construction of the will and the power conferred upon the executor, would be contrary to the spirit of our statute, which abolished the fine distinction and subtleties of the common law. [Sec. 45, R. S. 1899]. For, if power given to more than one executor survives to and may be executed by those who remain, after the death of the donees, as this statute provides to be the case, no good reason can be given why the power of consent given by this will to the son and daughter, should not survive to the daughter, after the death of the son").

(2) And where two executors named in a will were directed by it to sell a particular parcel of land to an individual named, for a specified sum, and to sell the other estate, if deemed necessary, to pay debts, etc., and both joined in the conveyance of the particular parcel, but afterward one of them alone sold and conveyed other lands of the testator, the purchaser of the last-mentioned land was not precluded from showing that the executor who did not join in the conveyance had refused and neglected to take upon himself the execution of the will, after joining in the first-mentioned conveyance. Roseboom v. Mosher, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 61. (3) At common law where there is a naked power given to coexecutors to sell land, it does not survive to one executor, but where the power is coupled with an interest it will survive. Muldrow v. Fox, 2 Dana (Ky.) 74; Wooldridge v. Watkins, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 349. (4) The power of sale given executors under a will is coupled with an interest and can be exercised by the survivor, where the active duty of managing the property and changing investments was given by the will, which provided that the debts were to be paid and the slaves taken care of and reinvestments made for the benefit of the testator's wife and children. Wilson v. Snow, 228 U. S. 217, 33 SCt 487, 57 L. ed. 807 [aff 35 App. (D. C.) 562]. (5) Where a testator gives his widow the right in conjunction with his other executor to sell the property in fee in case of necessity, the power of sale cannot be exercised by the wife alone, the other executor having died. Dolan v. Brown, 81 N. J. Eq. 262, 86 A 935.

[b] Substitution of executors.—(1) Where a will appointed certain persons executors with power to sell the testator's real estate, but a codicil annulled the section of the will in which such persons were appointed executors, and appointed certain other executors, and exonerated them from giving bond, such codicil did not annul the power to sell given the executors by the original will, but its effect was merely to substitute another set of executors with the same powers, duties, and discretion. Bruce v. Goodbar, 104 Tenn. 638, 58 SW 282. (2) So also, where a testator appointed three executors, but by a codicil revoked the appointment of one of them and substituted another person in his place, a power of sale given by the will vested in the two remaining original executors appointed by the will and the executor appointed by the codicil. Pratt v. Rice, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 209.

[c] Marriage of executrix.—Where the wife was appointed executrix with another, and the other died, her remarriage did not terminate a power of sale to pay debts of the estate, given by the will. Holman v. Houston Oil Co., (Tex. Civ. A.) 152 SW 885.

[d] Grant of power personal to executor.—A will devising real estate to a beneficiary for life, with gift over to her descendants, and empowering the executor to sell the property and hold the avails in place of the real estate, and appointing a son of testatrix executor, confers on the executor a power of sale, which is purely personal and does not survive the executor. Hart v. Shurtleff, 76 Misc. 615, 137 NYS 249.

[e] The court will not direct a sale by a commissioner where the will authorizes the executor to sell and there is no charge of insolvency or misconduct against him. American Bible Soc. v. Noble, 32 S. C. Eq. 156.

[f] Sale through referee.—There is no authority in law for a court, in compelling the exercise of a power of sale, to direct the sale to be made through a referee, it not having been charged or found that the executor was unfit or without capacity to make it. Holly v. Gibbons, 176 N. Y. 520, 68 NE 889, 98 AmSR 694, 177 N. Y. 401, 69 NE 731 [rev 67 App. Div. 628, 74 NYS 1132].

[g] Circumstances not amounting to valid execution of power.—A power given an executor to sell any such portion of the lands devised as might become necessary for any reason unforeseen by testator, but only with the consent of the devisees, was his discharge as executor,[30] or where he has renounced the office.[31] It frequently happens, however, that a testator directs or authorizes a sale without expressly declaring by whom it shall be made, and in such case the rule is that the executor will take a power of sale by implication if the will imposes upon him the duty, or he is bound by law, to see to the application of the proceeds,[32] but not otherwise.[33] It has also been held that if the person appointed to sell refuses to perform the trust or dies before he has completed it, the sale should be made by the executor.[34] Where a will directing a sale of realty nominates no executor, there is no implied power of sale in any one, and the only way a sale can legally be made is by an application to the court.[35] The mere fact that a testamentary power might, upon the death of the executor, be exercised by an administrator with the will annexed,[36] does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to appoint a person to execute the power where no such administrator has been appointed.[37] Where testator devised real estate to his wife for life or during widowhood, and after her death or remarriage to his children and the descendants of any deceased child, and appointed the wife executor and trustee for her benefit for life or until remarriage, and provided that on her death or remarriage a son and daughter should be executors and trustees as successors to the wife with power to sell the residue, the wife during widowhood had no power to sell, but the power of sale could only be exercised by the son and daughter acting as executors and trustees on the wife's death or remarriage.[38] Where testatrix devised to her son in trust a certain farm, to be held for seven years for the use of her children, providing, however, that the farm might be sold at any time within such period if a majority of the children should elect, the executor had no power of sale over such real estate at the request of a majority of the children, but they alone could exercise control over the transfer of the title.[39] It has been held that, where a piece of land is devised to be sold for purposes of division among designated beneficiaries, if they are all sui juris and all concur, they may convey it by deed, or a single beneficiary may convey by deed his undivided interest in the property or in the proceeds of its sale.[40]

[§ 648] (b) Delegation of Power. An executor cannot delegate a discretionary power to sell land given him by the will,[41] but he may allow his agent or attorney in fact, subject to his supervision not validly executed by a parol agreement to sell, made when no necessity had arisen, between the executor and a proposed purchaser, consented to by the devisees, and the execution by such devisees, at the direction of the executor, for the purpose of carrying out such parol agreement, of an ordinary warranty deed, without reference to the power. "The object of the power to sell was to raise money for the legacies, which it is, of course, the duty of the executor to discharge; and the will regulates the sale, by declaring it to be at public auction, which it would not have done, if it was intended that the sale should not be made by the constituted agents of the will, but under the directions of this Court. [a] Delegation of power to co-executor.—Where a will authorizes such of the executors "as shall or approval, to negotiate and make sales,[42] and may ratify a sale made by such agent or attorney.[43]

[§ 649] (3) What Property May Be Sold.[44] With reference to what property may be sold by the executor the provisions of the will must govern.[45] If the power given is to sell only certain specified realty, or only a certain part of the realty, the executor cannot sell any of the other realty without an order of court,[46] unless a power qualify and survive" to sell testator's lands, all who qualify and survive must join in a contract of sale, and one of them cannot delegate to another the power to act for him, at least unless all have jointly agreed on the terms of sale, so that no discretion remains to be exercised, and even then the contract must purport to be that of all. Tarlton v. Gilsey, (N. J.) 37 A 467. But compare Roe v. Smith, 42 Misc. 89, 85 NYS 527 [aff 97 App. Div. 633 mem, 89 NYS 1115 mem] (where two executors were authorized by will to sell the lands of the estate as trustees, a written, unsealed agreement, purporting to be that of such executors, signed by one only of them, who had been authorized by the other executor to act for him in signing the contract, is enforceable).

[b] An independent executor cannot delegate his discretionary power with respect to a sale. McCown v. Terrell, 9 Tex. Civ. A. 66, 29 SW 484.

[a] Illustration. — An executor with discretionary power to sell land exercised the power where he determined to sell particular land in small tracts, authorized an attorney in fact to negotiate sales and subdivide to suit purchasers, and considered the sales made by such agent to be advantageous to the estate, and assented thereto as they were made, and the facts concerning them were from time to time, as the business progressed, reported to him, although the deeds were executed by the attorney in fact. Terrell v. McCown, 91 Tex. 231, 43 SW 2 [rev (Civ. A.) 40 SW 54].

[b] There seems to be a distinction, in respect to the authority of an executor to act by an agent or attorney, between a devise of an estate to the executors in trust to sell and a devise merely of a power of sale. In the first case he may act by attorney, while in the other case he may not. May v. Frazee, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 391, 14 AmD 159.

[d] Execution of written contract of sale.—Where two executors have orally agreed to a contract for the sale of the land, authority to reduce the agreement to writing and formally sign it may be delegated by one to the other. [a] Will authorizing sale of all property.—Where a will, after making several specific bequests, directed the executor "to sell the whole of my real, personal, and mixed property," and directed the disposition to be made of the proceeds, it sufficiently appeared on the face of the will that it was intended to cover and provide for the sale of all real property owned by the testator at the time of his death. Liggat v. Hart, 23 Mo. 127.

[b] Wills authorizing sale of homestead.—(1) The executors had power to sell the homestead upon the marriage of the widow where the will provided as follows: "I give and devise to my beloved wife . . . the use of my homestead, to consist of four acres, whereon I now reside, as long as she remains my widow. I also give to her one-half of the income of my estate, both real and personal, as long as she remains my widow; but should she marry, she then shall have one-third of the proceeds of my estate, both real and personal, to her own and separate use, and not at the control of her husband. I also give to my said wife . . . such of my household furniture as she brought to me at my marriage, and also such of my household furniture as she may choose. . . . It is my will, and I do hereby authorize my executors to sell and dispose of all my lands, real estate and personal property, not herein disposed of, as soon after my decease as can conveniently be done; also, after the death of my wife, to sell and dispose of the homestead, with the four acres attached, being the same hereinbefore devised to my wife during her widowhood." Huyler v. Kingsland, 11 N. J. Eq. 406, 407. (2) A testamentary provision authorizing the executor, in case the personal estate is insufficient to pay the debts, "to sell so much of my real estate as may be necessary for that purpose," authorizes the executor to sell the homestead, subject to the life estate of the widow. Willier v. Cummings, 91 Nebr. 571, 136 NW 559, AnnCas 1913D 287. (3) Where testator devised his entire estate, real and personal, to his executors in trust for his heirs, and gave them power to sell for the payment of debts, expressing a desire that his homestead should not be sold unless necessary, but that it should be used by his wife and children as a home, the executors had authority to sell the homestead if it should become necessary. Etcheborne v. Auzerais, 45 Cal. 121. (4) Where a testator, after devising a life estate in his home to his wife, directed that all his other real estate be sold, and he did not own any other real estate besides the home place, the clause "all my other real estate" referred to the reversionary interest in the home place, and the testator intended that such interest should be sold by his executors. Wallace v. Phipps, 1 Tenn. Ch. A. 326.

[c] Will not providing sale of homestead.—A will providing that testator's wife should have her portion of the homestead, and further provided that the sons should have the use of the rest, and, whenever the interest of the estate required, that a portion should be platted, and so many of the lots sold as were necessary to create a fund sufficient to pay from the income the taxes and expenses of platting, did not authorize a sale of any portion of the homestead where it had not been platted. Petit v. Flint, etc., R. Co., 114 Mich. 362, 72 NW 238.

[d] Under a provision that the homestead shall not be sold until necessary, and that it shall be used by wife and children, the executors have authority to sell it if it becomes necessary. Etcheborne v. Auzerais, 45 Cal. 121.

[e] Land decreed to be sold under mortgage.—Although a tract of land is decreed to be sold to satisfy a mortgage, the executor of the mortgagor, authorized by the will to sell all the testator's real and personal estate, may sell it for a full and fair price, with the consent of the mortgagee or his attorney. [a] Illustration.—Where the will gives power to the executor to sell only lands situate in certain counties to pay the testator's debts, and such lands are insufficient for that purpose, the executor cannot, without an order of court, sell lands in other counties to make up the deficiency. Kinney v. Knoebel, 51 Ill. 112.

[b] Sale of more than necessary.—Under a will empowering an executor, if he deemed it necessary, to sell and convey so much of the real estate as might be required to pay the debts, his sale of the whole property for seven hundred dollars, where the debts amounted only to two hundred dollars, was unauthorized. Tarpy v. Lexington, etc., R. Co., 154 Ky. 345, 157 SW 726.

[c] Where a testator authorized his executors to sell either one of two tracts, the sale of one exhausted their power and they could not subsequently sell the other. Brown v. Beard, 6 N. C. 125.

[d] Sale to make up deficiency of personal assets.—Where the power is to sell all the tenements or so much as with the goods is sufficient to pay debts, etc., there must be a deficiency and a sale can be made only to the extent thereof. Dike v. Ricks, Cro. Car. 335, 79 Reprint 893.

[e] Power to sell business.—Where a will provided that testator devised to his executors all his real property in trust, to continue his of sale in respect thereto can be fairly implied.[47] A power to sell "any" real property has been held to mean "all,"[48] and authority to sell "all and any part" of testator's realty has been construed to mean "all or any part" of the real estate of which testator died seized, and not to require that if any was sold, all should be sold.[49] A general power of sale has been held to authorize a sale of lands expressly devised, where such sale accorded with the testator's apparent intention,[50] but it has also been held that a clause authorizing the executors to sell or rent any property which testator possessed at his death applies only to property not specifically devised.[51] Under a power to sell lands executors cannot convey their testator's rights in land of which he died disseized, even to the disseizor.[52] Where an executor is empowered by the will to sell any portion of the real estate, he is vested with a discretion to determine what property shall be sold.[53] A power to sell and dispose of any of the testator's "securities" does not authorize the executor to sell any land.[54] A power to sell and convey all the testator's real estate at their discretion is sufficient to support a sale by the executors, not only of all the territorial extent of the lands whereof the testator died seized, but also of all his title and interest therein.[55] Where testator authorized his executors in their discretion to sell all of his real estate not specifically devised, except that devised to his wife, no part of which was to be sold without her consent, and also gave to his wife the income of certain buildings for life, or so long as she should remain unmarried, the power of sale was only a power to sell the remainders in the lands devised for life.[56] A widow cannot complain that more land was sold than would have been necessary to pay debts, where if her claims had been allowed in full the proceeds would not have been more than was necessary for this purpose.[57]

[§ 650] (4) Notice to Heirs. Where a part of a devise to executors in trust with power to sell was void and such part passed to the heir of the testator, the executor, intending to exercise the power, should notify the heir of his intention so to do.[58]

[§ 651] (5) Time for Selling.[59] Where the will contains directions as to the time at which the property shall be sold, such directions should of course be followed,[60] but the executor's power to sell is not ordinarily terminated by his failure pawnbroking business until his son should arrive at twenty-five years of age, unless the executors should agree that the sale of his business before that time should be of benefit to his estate, when they were authorized to sell the same, and required the executors to collect the rents, profits, and income, and distribute the same according to the provisions of the will, such executors had no power to sell real estate, not a part of the pawnbroking business, before the son arrived at the age of twenty-five years. O'Reilly v. Platt, 80 App. Div. 348, 80 NYS 829.

[a] After - acquired property.—Where a testator directs his executor to sell the real estate owned by him at the time he made the will, describing it as "my said home farm," and the disposition of his estate is such that the purposes disclosed by the will cannot be effectuated without a sale of all the real estate of the testator, a power of sale as to after-acquired property is implied, and should be exercised by the executor. S. C.—Mobley v. Jackson, 105 S. C. 450, 90 SE 23.

[a] Construction of wills.—(1) Where a will in unequivocal terms gave testator's widow a life estate in certain property, and provided that at her death the property should be sold and the proceeds divided among testator's children in specified proportions, and the concluding sentence provided that the executor should "have the use of the above-described lands for one year free of rent, and is to have one year after my decease to sell the lands, and charge no fee for settling up the estate," the testator's evident intention was to give his widow a life estate, and after her death to give the executor a year's use of the land for compensation, at the expiration of which time he was to sell the same; and as the insertion of the word "wife's" between "my" and "decease" would have made that intention clear, and such word was evidently omitted by mistake, it would be supplied by the court to effectuate the testator's intention. Lash v. Lash, 209 Ill. 595, 70 NE 1049. (2) Where a testator granted to his executor the term of five years in which to sell his estate, "using said time as in the judgment of my executor and the family may be deemed best in the interest of my estate," a sale within five years was discretionary, and thereafter mandatory, and a sale by the executor after five years conveyed good title. Fredericks v. Kerr, 129 Pa. 365, 68 A 835. (3) Where testator provided by his will that his real estate should be sold when the youngest child of his son should come of age, and that if a sale was made during the lifetime of the son, a sum should be set aside for the support of his son, it was held that the sale would be made on the coming of age of the son's youngest child living at the death of the testator. Gehr v. McDowell, 206 Pa. 100, 55 A 851.

[b] "Not less," in a direction that executors shall sell real estate "as soon as practicable, not less than eighteen months" after testator's death, means "within," such intention being apparent from the will as a whole. Hubbard v. Hubbard, 18 Misc. 276, 41 NYS 1011.

[c] Where a testator devised land to be sold to educate his children, it may be thence inferred that he intended the sale to be made during their minority. Muldrow v. Fox, 2 Dana (Ky.) 74.

[d] Execution of deed.—A power of sale in an executor to be executed within a given time does not necessitate the execution of a deed within that period if the sale itself has been within it, and parol evidence is admissible to show that a deed dated after the expiration of the period is in consummation of a sale made within the period. Harlan v. Brown, 2 Gill (Md.) 475, 41 AmD 436.

[e] Sale of leased land to tenant.—Where a will recited that testatrix has rented certain real estate for three years, and directed the executor, in case of her death before the expiration of the lease, to collect to do so within the time directed by the will,[61] although there are a few cases in which such a power has been held to terminate by such nonexercise.[62] If no time for the sale is fixed by the will, it is discretionary with the executor when he will sell,[63] and while this rule is subject to the limitation that it is his duty to sell within a reasonable time,[64] a long lapse of time since the probate of a will does not constitute any objection to the exercise of a power to sell real estate, if the duty to sell it still exists,[65] although it may, it has been held, enable the heirs or devisees to prevent the rents, and to give the tenant three months' notice before the expiration of his term, and authorized the executor to sell such property, and in another clause testatrix expressed a wish that her estate might be settled as soon as convenient "after sale has been made of my said property," the executors were entitled to sell the land without terminating the tenant's possession, and hence a sale to the tenant without giving the three months' notice was proper. Hanbest v. Grayson, 206 Pa. 59, 55 A 786.

[f] Effect of testamentary direction.—A direction in a will to the executor to sell testator's land "as soon as the same can be done without sacrifice" refers to the time when the land can be sold, and does not lessen his duty when he decides to offer it for sale to employ the degree of diligence characterizing the conduct of a reasonably prudent person in the management of his own affairs, and he takes the proceeds of the sale in his capacity of executor. In re Branch, 123 Mo. A. 573, 100 SW 516.

[g] Intention of testator governs.—"The time when a power in trust for the sale of the testator's real estate can legally and properly be executed must, like every other disposition of property by will, depend upon the intention of the testator, to be ascertained upon an examination of everything contained within the four corners of the will, and with reference to the objects the testator had in contemplation by the execution of the power. It is not very strange, therefore, that we should find cases in the books on this subject which are apparently in conflict with each other, until they are analyzed in reference to this principle of carrying into effect the intention of the testator." Edgerton v. Conklin, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 224, 238.

[h] Effect of statute.—A statute providing that real estate not disposed of by executors or administrators within twelve months after the testator's death shall go to the devisees or heirs beneficially entitled, unless the executors or administrators have registered a caution as therein provided, does not apply to sales under a power in a will containing express directions as to the time and manner of conversion. Molton v. Sutphin, 66 N. J. Eq. 20, 57 A 974. (2) A limitation of the time is inoperative when it is evident that the intention of the testator was that all his property should be converted into money and divided in the manner directed by the will. "In the exercise of such power of sale, however, the executors necessarily should use reasonable prudence to see that the real estate is not sacrificed, but under pretense of protecting or regulating the estate they cannot continue indefinitely to refuse to sell the real estate and satisfy this legacy, or to wait for some imaginary rise in value of the same." [a] What is a reasonable time within which an executor should execute a direction to convert land to money depends on the circumstances of each particular case. In the absence of special modifying facts, the eighteen months within which an executor must account might be considered a reasonable time. In re Weston, 91 N. Y. 502, 510 ("there is, and there can be, no rigid and arbitrary standard by which to measure the reasonable time within which the discretion of an executor directed to convert an estate into money must operate. If, in some instances, the English cases indicate a disposition to fix upon one year, because at that date the executor may be compelled to account, in other instances such fixed or arbitrary standard appears to have been rejected. Hughes v. Empson, 22 Beav. 181, 52 Reprint 1077; Buxton v. Buxton, 1 Myl. & C. 80, 13 EngCh 80, 40 Reprint 307; Garrett v. Noble, 6 Sim. 504, 9 EngCh 504, 58 Reprint 683; Bate v. Hooper, 5 De G. The better opinion derived from them would seem to be that each case must stand upon its own facts; that what would be a reasonable time in one instance might not be in another; and while the one year allowed to close the estate may sometimes mark the limit of discretion, and is always a circumstance to be considered, it is not necessarily conclusive. In this state, at all events, there is no arbitrary standard").

[b] The sale should be made as soon as possible without sacrifice where the direction to sell is imperative, and the executors, offering the land for sale a year after the probate of the will, should sell to the highest bidder, and where they have refused a reasonable price, no allowance will be made for the cost of again offering the property for sale or for after-accruing taxes and insurance. [c] Liabilities in case of delay.—Delay on the part of executors to sell lands directed by the will to be sold for the payment of debts will render the executors liable for rents and profits. Emes v. Emes, 11 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 325.

the execution of the power and take possession of the land and dispose of it as they may deem proper, if they consider that course more to their interest than a sale under the will.[66] If the will directs a sale to be made at a future time, or on the happening of a contingency, it is apparent that the power does not exist until the time arrives or the contingency happens, and if a sale is made prior thereto it is void,[67] unless the will gives authority to the executor, at his discretion, to sell at a time other than that named in the will,[68] although some cases have considered that, where the sale was to be made upon the happening of a contingency which was sure to happen, the executor might sell before it actually happened, where the beneficiaries consented.[69] Executors who are directed to sell on the happening of a certain event, are not, however, bound to sell as soon as the event happens, on any terms or for any price that may be offered, but they are to see that the price and terms are rea-

But compare Henson's Est., 12 Pa. Dist. 326, 28 Pa. Co. 671 (it is at least doubtful whether a power of sale, given as a mere incident to the office of executor, could be validly exercised seventeen years after the death of the testator, where the estate has been not only presumptively, but actually, fully administered and awarded to the executors as trustees under the will).

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Under a general clause in a will authorizing executors to sell real estate to pay testator's debts, but not to sell a certain farm until they could get thirty dollars an acre for it, a sale of such farm after a lapse of five years at a less price will be upheld when necessary to pay testator's debts. Pratt v. Worrell, 66 N. J. Eq. 194, 57 A 450. (2) Where a will gave testatrix's husband a life estate in certain land, and directed the land to be sold after the husband's death and the proceeds divided among nine persons, and further gave the executor "full power to do all that is needed to the full execution thereof, to sell and convey, by deed or otherwise, real and personal property; to make all payments, divisions and dispositions herein provided," the power of sale was given merely for purpose of distribution after the husband's death, and did not empower the executor to sell before that time. [b] A direction not to sell until a named price can be obtained (1) attached to a general clause in a will authorizing executors to sell real estate is to be construed, not as a limitation upon the authority of the executors, but merely as evidencing a desire on the part of the testator reasonably to conserve the estate to the best advantage. In such case the property should be withheld a reasonable time from sale in the hope of realizing the price fixed, but, if it is not realized within a reasonable period, the sale should take its course under the general provisions of the will. sonable, satisfactory, fair, and adequate and that the property is not sacrificed needlessly for some nominal amount.[70] It has been held that the executor should not sell while there is a cloud on the title of the land, which affects its value;[71] and the time for the conversion of property may be extended by the agreement of all persons interested.[72] A conveyance by the executor before probate of the will has been held good where the will was afterward probated.[73] Where an executor is given power to hold and manage realty, or to rent it, or to sell it, he is not required to elect at the outset of his administration which course he will pursue, but, after managing it for a time and renting it for a time, may exercise the power of sale.[74] The power of an executor to sell real estate to distribute the estate cannot be exercised after devisees have conveyed a part of their interests in the estate.[75]

[§ 652] (6) Manner and Conduct of Sale.[76] An executor who is given a power of sale by the will has as a rule considerable discretion as to the manner and conduct thereof,[77] but of course any directions given in the will are controlling,[78] and it is sometimes provided by statute that in the absence of directions in the will the sale must be conducted in all respects as if made under order of court.[79] While public auction sales are sometimes insisted on,[80] the more general rule permits a private sale at the discretion of the executor, prudently and honestly exercised.[81] Statutes with respect to appraisement, advertisement, notice, and the like are usually held applicable only to sales under judicial license, and not to those made under a power in the will;[82] and it has been held that a testamentary direction that an appraisal by the executor shall precede the sale of property under a power created by the will does not necessarily make the appraisal a positive prerequisite to the exercise of the power.[83] Notice has been held not essential to the validity of a sale under testamentary authority.[84] A general statute requiring a special bond for the sale of a decedent's realty[85] has been held not to apply to a sale by an executor under power in the will,[86] but it is sometimes expressly required by statute that an executor selling under testamentary power shall give bond.[87] Where the powers conferred by a will included the power to settle, adjust, and compromise all debts owing by the testator, and to make settlement with his former partners and each of them, without authority from any court, and to sell and convey either at public or private sale any or all of the testator's real estate on such terms as to the executors should seem best, a sale made by them under such powers, without giving notice of the time, place, and terms of sale, and without including the value of the real estate in the bond given by them when they qualified, did not render the conveyance invalid.[88] It is within the discretion of the executor at a public sale to bid up the property, in his representative capacity, to the price at which he

[§ 653] (7) Terms and Conditions.[90] A power of sale given to executors by will can only be exercised by a conveyance to an actual, bona fide, money purchaser,[91] and it is the duty of the executor to realize the best price obtainable.[92] The safer and more prudent course when exercising a power is to sell for cash or its equivalent;[93] but where the will gives the executor power to sell on credit, he may do so at his discretion,[94] and sales with mortgage security on the land itself for deferred payments are sometimes justified, in the exercise of good faith and reasonable prudence.[95] Where testator directs his executor to sell and convey the coal underlying the lands, with the usual mining privileges, the executor cannot be surcharged with money which he could have obtained by conveying the coal by a deed containing a waiver and release of the right of the surface and lateral support.[96] A deed executed by the widow, surviving children, and executors of a deceased partner, conveying decedent's interest in certain real estate held by the partners in common to the surviving partner in consideration of his conveying to decedent's sons shares in the real estate which had been set off to them in the division, was not an exercise of a power of sale contained in decedent's will, authorizing his executors to sell his real estate "either for cash or part on bond and mortgage, as they might deem advisable."[97] A will authorizing the executrix to manage the estate as she should deem best, and to sell any portion or the whole thereof, and to invest the proceeds as she should deem fit, has been held to empower the executrix to convey real property to a trustee, who was to hold for a syndicate which was to plat the same, under the terms of which sale the purchase price secured by a lien on the property was made payable in installments.[98] A sale made during the term of a lease executed by the testator must be subject to the rights of the lessee.[99]

[c] Taking judgment against third persons in payment.—If executors selling real estate under a power in the will accept in payment a judgment against a third person which is guaranteed by the purchaser, and it is lost by the neglect, the purchaser is discharged, and the executors are personally liable. Shippen v. Clapp, 36 Pa. 89.

[d] Taking shares of stock in payment.—A power given to executors to sell land does not authorize them to sell the testator's coal lands for the purpose of organizing a mining company and to receive its stock in payment; and if they do so, they are chargeable with the sum for which the lands could have been sold, with interest. Adair v. Brimmer, 74 N. Y. 539.

[a] Illustration.—The will provided that, upon the decease of his wife, the whole estate should be converted into cash, but that the proceeds of all sales made prior to her decease be invested on bond and mortgage, it was held that the testator did not intend to require a sale for money, but to prevent the sale for other property except the equivalent of cash, and that, accordingly, the trustees were authorized to accept a purchase-money mortgage in part payment. Faile v. Crawford, 30 App. Div. 536, 52 NYS 353.

[b] Construction of will.—Where testator ordered that his farm should be sold "to the best advantage and highest bidder; one third of the purchase money being secured . . . by bond and mortgage," and the interest payable to his wife for life, and he referred to this money "as secured on the farm for her benefit," and charged it with the payment of her debts and funeral expenses, and gave the balance to his children, the will did not require a first mortgage lien to the amount of the third of the purchase money. Cumberland Trust Co. v. Padgett, 70 N. J. Eq. 349, 354, 61 A 837, 840 ("In this case the mortgage in question was by the terms of the will not to be taken as security for a loan of money, but to secure a part of the price of the land sold. The will ordered that the land should be sold 'to the best advantage and highest bidder.' To secure these characteristics might readily require the purchase-money mortgage to be, not first, but second, because the highest bidder might need to borrow money on first mortgage, in order to pay the highest price for the farm").

court is not necessary,[3] and even a statutory requirement of confirmation has been held not to apply where real estate is devised to the executor in trust for purposes mentioned in the will, and a sale of such real estate directed.[4]

Objections not sufficient to prevent confirmation. As a sale by an executor passes only such interest as the testator had in the property,[5] it is not a ground of objection to a confirmation of the sale that another person has an interest in property;[6] nor, when it is within the discretion of the executor whether he will make a sale under the power, can confirmation be successfully opposed on the ground that the sale is not for the best interest of the estate[7] or of some particular heir.[8]

Limitations on power of court to refuse confirmation. When a proper memorandum of the sale is made, the executors have exercised the power conferred upon them by the will, and the sale, in the absence of fraud or irregularity, is binding upon the estate, subject to confirmation; and the court must confirm it unless the price bid is disproportionate to the value of the property, and it is made to appear that an increased bid of ten per cent can be obtained.[9]

Notice of hearing. It has been held that where the sale was made at public auction, the judge must make an order fixing a day for hearing the report, and the clerk must give notice thereof; and in the absence of such order and notice by the clerk, the court has no power to confirm the sale, and, if it make an order of confirmation, may, on its own motion, set it aside.[10]

Questions considered on application. An administrator cum testamento annexo, applying for approval of his sale of testator's lands, must establish by proof his right to act as such administrator in the state in order to give jurisdiction to the orphans' court,[11] but on such an application the court may not consider or adjudicate upon a claim that the lands descended to testator's heirs at law, or were specifically devised by his will, and were not within the power of sale conferred by the will.[12]

Judgment not amounting to confirmation. Where a residuary legatee sought by petition to have the executors account for the rents and profits of real estate which they had sold to a third person, and the executors answered, and the court after settling their account entered a judgment by which their deeds conveying the real estate were adjudged valid, the judgment was not a confirmation of the sale.[13]

Revocation or correction of ratification. Where the order of ratification of a sale, made and reported by executors under authority conferred by the will, has been procured by an honest mistake, the orphans' court has the power of revocation and correction, provided the application is made within a reasonable time.[14]

Effect of ratification by beneficiaries. Where an executor had authority to sell land for the benefit of certain persons, and purporting to act under the power he did so, but failed to make any return so that there was no confirmation, the beneficiaries having so ratified the sale as to estop them from disputing it, it was held that the court having jurisdiction of the probate proceedings might, because of

Or.—Northrop v. Marquam, 16 Or. 173, 18 P 449.

[a] Character of sale not affected by statutory requirement of confirmation.—A sale by an executor under a power in the will is not a judicial sale, nor does the statutory requirement that no title shall pass until the sale is confirmed give to it the incidents of a judicial sale. The purchaser deals with the executor in making the purchase as he would with any other vendor, and his rights and liabilities are governed by the rules applicable to such sales generally. The sale is treated as if made under the power; and the purchaser is required to examine the sufficiency of this power, as he is that of any other power under which a sale may be made. Goodell v. Sanford, 31 Mont. 163, 77 P 522 [appr In re Pearsons, 98 Cal. 603, 33 P 451].

[b] Contract for sale.—Under a statute, declaring that on a return of a sale by the executors, if it appears that the price is disproportionate and a sum exceeding the bid by ten per cent can be had, the sale may be vacated, where executors acting under a power of sale in the will orally agreed to sell certain property, and received a portion of the purchase money, such contract for sale must be confirmed, unless the price paid was disproportionate, and an increased bid of ten per cent can be obtained. In re Robinson, 142 Cal. 152, 75 P 777.

[d] A sale by an independent executor is not within the Washington statute requiring confirmation. Provident Life, etc., Co. v. Mills, 91 Fed. 435.

[e] Confirmation merely erroneous.—Where the court having jurisdiction construes a will as authorizing a sale without notice, an order confirming such sale is not void for want of jurisdiction, but at most erroneous, and the title of the purchaser at such sale is good as against one claiming under decedent. the estoppel, confirm the sale and direct execution of the conveyance upon a compliance with the terms of the contract by the purchaser.[15]

Review of confirmation. An order confirming an executor's sale of realty is ordinarily subject to review,[16] and on appeal from such an order it is the duty of appellant to furnish the return of sale.[17] Where, on an application for the confirmation of an executor's sale of real estate, the purchaser filed objections on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and on such objections being overruled the court took testimony on the merits without any answer or other opposition being filed by such purchaser, and refused to confirm the sale, the purchaser was not entitled to review such refusal on appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial.[18]

[§ 655] (9) Who May Purchase[19]—(a) In General. As a general rule where an executor is authorized to sell he may sell to any person.[20]

[§ 656] (b) Executor or Administrator—aa. General Rule. It is well established as a general rule that an executor or administrator cannot become the purchaser at his own sale of the property of his decedent.[21] Neither can one executor or administrator lawfully become the purchaser at a sale made by his coexecutors or coadministrators.[22] The rule precludes the representative not only from purchasing outright, but also from being interested in any purchase at a sale by him;[23] neither is it confined in its application to a direct purchase, but an indirect purchase by means of an agent or a third person who is the ostensible purchaser but who really acts for the representative in order to enable him to acquire title may also be avoided.[24]

[§ 657] bb. Limitations of Rule. Express authority in the will may, of course, warrant a purchase by the executor,[25] and the executor may obtain leave of court to purchase at his own sale, in which case a purchase by him will give him good title.[26] It has also been asserted that where the representative has a personal interest in the property he may become the purchaser,[27] and a purchase by the representative has also been upheld where the sale was a fair one and a fair price was given for the property.[28] Neither does the rule under discussion apply to a purchase, under an option in a lease executed by the testator, by a corporation lessee in which the executor is a stockholder.[29] Where a mortgagee was appointed administrator of the estate of the mortgagor, but did not take possession of the mortgaged premises or take any steps to have them sold for the payment of debts, but foreclosed his mortgage while he was acting as administrator, he had the right to become the purchaser at the foreclosure sale.[30] Where a member of a firm owning realty dies, the administrator of the deceased partner may, in his private or individual capacity, purchase the land from the survivor.[31] There is no reason why an administrator appointed in one state should not become the purchaser of land of his decedent situated in another state.[32] A person who was nominated as an executor in the will, but has not qualified or acted as such, may purchase the property of the testator at a sale made by the executor or executors who did qualify,[33] or a representative who has resigned or been discharged may become a purchaser at a sale subsequently made by the personal representatives remaining in office, or by his successor.[34] A representative who has sold real property of his decedent may purchase the same for himself from the purchaser at his sale, provided the first sale was real and bona fide and not a mere sham or pretense to enable the representative to acquire title.[35]

[§ 658] cc. Whether Sale Void or Voidable. A purchase by an executor or administrator at his own sale is usually held to be not void but merely voidable at the option of those interested;[36] but where the transaction is tainted with actual fraud, it is void.[37] So also, where the executors had no power to sell, but under the mistaken belief that they had, sold the real estate, and became the purchasers of a portion of it, it was held that the sale was void, and could not be enforced against them.[38]

[§ 659] dd. Ratification. A purchase by an executor or administrator at his own sale may be ratified by the persons interested.[39] An acquiescence in the sale by the heirs for a long time will create a presumption of ratification,[40] and an heir or legatee who receives the proceeds with knowledge of the facts thereby ratifies the sale or becomes estopped subsequently to attack it.[41] Where the sale to himself was the only thing done by the administrator in connection with the administration the fact that the heirs joined in a petition praying that the administrator be discharged does not estop them to attack the sale.[42]

[§ 660] ee. Representative Not Bona Fide Purchaser. Even though a purchase by a representative at a sale by himself or by his corepresentatives pursuant to a power in the will is not set aside, still he is not a bona fide purchaser and entitled to protection as such.[43]

[§ 661] ff. Bona Fide Purchaser from Representative. Although a purchase by a representative at his own sale is voidable, a deed from him conveying the property to a bona fide purchaser who pays a valuable consideration will pass title,[44] and after there has been such a conveyance by the representative the original purchase by him will not be set aside.[45]

[§ 662] gg. Liability of Representative Who Has Purchased. An executor or administrator who has purchased or been interested in the purchase of real estate of his decedent sold by him is chargeable with the actual value of the property and not merely with the amount realized at the sale,[46] and he must also account for the profits made by a resale of the property to a bona fide purchaser;[47] but he is not chargeable with the value of land bid off by him at his sale, but lost through want of title in the testator.[48] Where the personal representative has improperly become the purchaser at a sale unnecessarily made by him, the heirs or devisees have a remedy in equity against him to compel a reconveyance of the property or a payment of the excess of the value, as ascertained by a second sale, over the price paid.[49]

[§ 663] (c) Relative of Representative. A sale to a near relative of the representative is improper and voidable,[50] especially if the representative has unduly favored such purchaser.[51] In a case where the court authorized the executor's wife to bid at a sale of real estate under testamentary power, it was held that the executor should be surcharged with the difference on the amount received on a sale to his wife and what would have been realized at a fair sale.[52]

[§ 664] (d) Agent or Partner of Representative. A sale by a personal representative to his agent or partner or to a firm of which he is a member cannot be upheld against the objection of the heirs or devisees,[53] especially where there has been bad faith in the transaction.[54]

[§ 665] (e) Attorney of Representative. A sale by an executor or administrator to his own attorney is improper for the reason that the sale may be supposed to be made under the influence, if not

Moore v. Carey, 116 Ga. 28, 42 SE 258 (holding further that, where in an action to set aside such sale it is sought to estop plaintiff on the ground that his guardian had collected the amount due him as his portion of the proceeds of the sale, and had paid it over to him on his arrival at majority after putting him in possession of all the facts, testimony of the guardian that, when he made the payment, it was stipulated by the ward that it should have no other effect than to pass the fund into his possession and should not estop him from seeking to set aside the sale was relevant).

"It was quite natural and not at all censurable, that she should desire her son, who had been his father's mainstay during his last days, to have the home place, instead of a stranger. Such preference, if she did not permit it to work an injury to the other heirs, could not be regarded rightly in any other light than praiseworthy; and, if she determined on letting her son have the farm at the highest price she had reason to think could be obtained for it, she should not be pronounced derelict for not seeking other buyers").

the pressure, of legal advice and induced by confidential relations which ought to be above suspicion.[55] This is especially true where the representative is illiterate and incompetent for the trust,[56] and in such case the attorney may at the option of the parties in interest be charged as trustee of the property purchased and required to account therefor,[57] without any evidence that the sale was in fact unfair or the price inadequate.[58]

[§ 666] (10) Conveyance[59] — (a) Form and Contents in General. A will giving the executor power to sell carries by necessary implication the power to convey,[60] which authority, it is held, may be delegated.[61] Although it is the better practice for a conveyance by an executor pursuant to a power to include a recital of such power,[62] such a recital is not necessary to the validity of the conveyance,[63] provided that the instrument shows that the grantor had in view the subject of the power.[64] Neither is it necessary that the conveyance should set out the existence of circumstances warranting the sale [65] or show that the sale was made in the manner authorized.[66] Where the power is given to two or more executors all should join in executing the deed, if all remain in office;[67] but if one or more fail to qualify or vacate the office, those who do qualify or who remain in office may execute the deed alone.[68] A deed which describes the grantor as executor is not invalid because not signed by him as executor,[69] nor is a deed invalid because of the omission of the word "grant" therefrom, where the words "remise, release and forever quit claim" are used.[70]

[§ 667] (b) Warranties or Covenants. A power of sale given by the will does not authorize an executor to bind the estate by covenants of general warranty,[71] but it has been held that, if he makes such covenants, they operate as a personal obligation,[72] unless the terms of the covenant indi-

"We call attention to the fact that it was held in Hosch Lumber Co. v. Weeks, 123 Ga. 366, 51 SE 439, that in selling wild land under the statute of that State, the executors must all join. That doctrine was reaffirmed on a second appeal, reported in 133 Ga. 472, 66 SE 168, 134 AmSR 213. The industry of counsel for respondent has not been able to furnish a precedent to the contrary." Armor v. Frey, supra.

[a] A deed from the devisee of the land and its proceeds tendered by the executors cannot without the purchaser's consent validate a deed under a power in the will, which was void because executed by only one of two joint executors. Wells v. Lewis, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 269.

[b] Effect of deed by one alone.—Where executors, acting under an imperative power in the will, offered certain real estate for sale at public auction, and after the sale, at which both executors were present, a deed was made to the purchaser by one of them, in which, for no assigned reason, the other did not join, and several years later the executor not joining died, without having at any time disputed the validity of the sale, the purchaser became the owner of the whole equitable title, the heirs at most holding the legal title as his trustees. cate that he did not intend to bind himself personally.[73] An executor cannot bind the estate by a covenant inserted in a deed to property sold by him under a naked power of sale,[74] but where two adjoining city lots were devised with a naked power of sale in the executor, and he conveyed one of them by deed containing a covenant that the grantee should not erect a building on the lot nearer than twenty feet from the street, and that no building should be erected on the adjoining lot nearer than the same distance from the street line, and subsequently conveyed the adjoining lot by deed containing no covenants, it was held that it was presumptively within the power of the executor to convey, as appurtenant to the lot first sold, an easement of light, air, and prospect over the remaining lot, and that the covenant restricting the use of the lot last sold was valid as against the purchaser, although no action could be maintained against the estate for damages for its violation.[75] It has also been held that, where on a sale of real estate under a power in the will the executors stipulated that all taxes, assessments, etc., would be allowed out of the purchase money and the property conveyed free from all encumbrances, and several years afterward an unpaid assessment which was a lien on the property was discovered, the purchaser might recover the amount of such assessment from the executors as such,[76]

[§ 668] (c) Construction and Effect. In matters of description the usual rules of construction as applied to conveyances will apply to a deed of land from an executor or administrator.[77] A covenant by the representative against his own acts does not by implication warrant the title or amount to a covenant that his decedent was seized of the premises.[78] The deed of an executor who had no estate whatever in the land, but only a power to sell, will be considered an exercise of that power;[79] but where the executor who conveyed had an individual interest but no power of sale, his conveyance passes his individual interest only,[80] and even where he had both an individual interest and a power to convey as executor, his conveyance made without actual reference to the power has been presumed a deed of his individual interest alone,[81] although it has also been considered that under such circumstances a question of intent arises.[82] The deed is not evidence of own-

[b] An executor may give his personal warranty of title, assuming the consequences, and sell accordingly. Mayer v. McCune, 59 HowPr (N. Y.) 78; Baley v. Measam, 2 RevdeLegis 337.

[c] Extent of liability.—Where executors conveyed land by deed and covenanted to the extent of assets to warrant and defend title, they rendered themselves personally liable to the extent of assets in their hands, and a failure to answer on a prayer for a discovery was an implied admission of assets. Nicholas v. Jones, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky) 385. See also Manifee v. Morrison, 1 Dana (Ky.) 208 (where the court, although considering the liability of an executor on such a covenant to be in his representative character, also considered that it was limited to the extent of the assets).

[d] The liability of an executor on his covenants of warranty is not affected by the fact that the purchaser had notice of the will, under which the executor had no power to sell. Wurdeman v. Robertson, 12 S. C. Eq. 115.

[e] A covenant of warranty against encumbrances done or suffered by himself does not render an executor to whom a discretionary power to sell land was given, liable to his purchaser where the land is sold for taxes assessed prior to his sale. Jackson v. Sassaman, 29 Pa. 106.

[f] Knowledge of purchaser that executor is without power to sell.—An executor, selling property of the testator, with warranty, cannot protect himself against a suit for breach of the warranty on the ground that the purchaser had notice of the will, under which the executor had no power to sell. Wurdeman v. Robertson, 12 S. C. Eq. 115.

[g] Contrary view.—"We see nothing in the case to show that at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed (when the rights were fixed) that there was any expectation of a personal liability by those who executed the deed 'as executors,' or those to whom the conveyance was made. If, therefore, these defendants are held to a personal liability, it will not be by reason of any agreement or understanding between the parties, or by reason of any agreement contained in the deed, but simply because the law created one liability from an ineffectual effort to create another. Has the law created this arbitrary liability? If so, it ought to be enforced. . . . Here the advertisement held out no hope of any personal or other guaranty—no evidence that the purchaser was misled by anything that was done or said. The warranty had not hurt the plaintiff in any respect whatsoever. The liability, if it was created, was created without consideration and without agreement. McDowall v. Reed, 28 S. C. 466, 6 SE 300. This was a suit on a bond signed by J. P. Reed, trustee. There was nothing in the bond to show for whom Reed was trustee, or what were the terms of his trust. The term 'trustee' was a mere description of the person. . . . We see no case, even where the obligee or vendee has been misled to his injury, in which a person assuming an authority which he did not have, and which he ought to have known he did not have, was held to a greater liability than the injury which he had inflicted. There are some dicta in some of these cases that are broad; but the decisions themselves restrict the recovery to the injury. There was no injury here that arose from the warranty clause." Ivey v. "When an executor authorized by will to make a conveyance has also an individual interest in the property, as devisee or otherwise, the question whether a conveyance by such person is an exercise of the power to convey given in the will, or the exercise only of the right to pass such person's individual interest, is a question of intent to be determined by consideration of the language used in the instrument and the circumstances under which it was executed and accepted." Feaster v. Fagan, supra.

[a] Where the conveyance shows that it was intended as an execution of the trust under the will it will ership by decedent at the time of his death.[83] Where the grantor in a conveyance styles himself the executor of a person last seized, and possession accompanies the deed, it will be presumed after the lapse of many years that the grantor had authority to make the deed.[84] Under a statute excepting out of a will the interest of any child or children not named or provided for, a sale by an executor under a power in the will, while it transfers to the purchaser all that the executor could lawfully sell, does not affect the interest of such child or children.[85] The mere form of a conveyance by an executor under a power in the will may be disregarded and the effect of the conveyance determined by the power.[86]

A deed executed under a power of attorney given by an executor authorized by will to sell the property is presumably valid.[87]

Effect of lack of seal. A deed by an executor, not under seal and in execution of a power, will be upheld as a contract to convey; and where testator's heirs have received a substantial part of the estate, they cannot defeat the deed because of the absence of the seal.[88]

[§ 669] (11) Payment and Recovery of Purchase Money[89]—(a) In General. Where real property is sold by executors under a power in the will, the executors are authorized to collect and receive the purchase money and enforce any security given for deferred payments,[90] and they do not lose their power as such to receive the money, nor is the purchaser relieved of his duty to pay to them because an unsuccessful effort has been made to secure the payment of the principal sum to the persons ultimately entitled to receive it from the executors.[91] Where an executor having power under the will to sell at any time makes a sale before the time of distribution under the will has arrived, he is authorized to take notes payable to himself in payment for the property.[92] Where executors offer real property of their testatrix for sale pursuant to the terms of the will, and a contract for the sale thereof is entered into with a person having no knowledge of the existence of a restrictive agreement, signed by the testatrix, with other property owners, thereby imposing a servitude on the land, the purchaser cannot be compelled specifically to perform the contract.[93] Where devisees transfer their undivided interest in the property, they cannot, as against the executor, be heard to allege fraud on the part of the transferee, or to deny the transfer, when the executor sells to such transferee and credits him on the price with the devisees' share of the proceeds.[94] Where the executor has sold realty it must be presumed that the money paid therefor is in his hands waiting distribution or that the persons entitled thereto have received it.[95]

[§ 670] (b) Payment in Confederate Money. Payment of purchase money or of a bond and mortgage given to secure the same, when due, in Confederate money, may be good and discharge the debt if the payment was made and accepted in good faith,[96] and an executor or administrator receiving such payment in good faith at a time when Confederate money was the only currency in general circulation is not liable for the resulting loss.[97]

[§ 671] (c) Actions to Recover—aa. In General. The right of the executor to sue for the purchase money and coerce payment follows as incidental to his right to receive the same,[98] but where he had no legal right to sell, he cannot maintain an action for the purchase money.[99]

Enforcement of vendor's lien. Under a statute authorizing a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another to sue thereon, administrators to whom a note for the purchase money of land sold by the estate is made payable can maintain an action to enforce a vendor's lien thereon, although the conveyance was made by the heirs.[1]

[§ 672] bb. Defenses. Fraud in the sale has been held a good defense to an action by the executor for the purchase money.[2] Where the property was sold without any contract as to encumbrances, and conveyed by deed without covenants, the fact that taxes were a lien thereon at the time of the sale, and were paid by the purchaser to remove the not be considered an individual conveyance of the executors, although they had an individual interest in the property. Feaster v. Fagan, 135 Iowa 633, 113 NW 479; Arlington State Bank v. Paulsen, 57 Nebr. 717, 78 NW 303.

Nelson v. McLaughlin, 20 Pa. Co. 385.

Miller v. Raynard, 7 Del. 559, 83 AmD 168. (2) Where there were misstatements in the advertisement of sale. Keily v. Saunders, 236 Pa. 593, 85 A 9.

[b] Remedy only against executor personally.—False and fraudulent representations made by the executor at the time of the sale in reencumbrance thereof, constitutes no defense to an action for the price.[3]

Counterclaims and credits. In an action on a note given to an executor for the purchase price of property sold by the executor to defendant, an answer that the testator was indebted to defendant in a sum named is not good as a counterclaim,[4] nor can a note for a certain amount executed by one of defendants to the mother of one of the minor legatees, which was not agreed to by the executor and which has never been paid, be allowed as a credit.[5]

Restoration of status quo. Although an executor's deed may have been defective, as purporting to convey his own interest only in the property, he having no legal interest in it, but only a naked power to sell, still the purchaser acquires an equitable estate by the deed which he must reconvey or offer to reconvey, before he can make any defense to the payment of notes given for the purchase money;[6] but it has been held that, where the sale itself is invalid, the purchaser is not bound to offer to surrender possession to entitle him to resist the collection of the purchase money.[7]

Estoppel. A purchaser of real estate from executors and trustees, on sale without order of court, after ratification by the orphans' court, when all persons interested appeared, and the fund from the sale has been distributed and a dividend paid creditors, is not entitled to question the validity of the sale in an action on a bond for the price.[8] So also beneficiary purchasers under a trust agreement, who assented thereto for years, entered into possession, sold portions of the property, made payments on the price, and in all respects ratified the transaction between the purchasing syndicate, of which they were members, and the vendor, until sued for the balance of the price, are estopped from claiming that they received no title to the property, or that the sale, which was one by an executrix under a power, was irregularly made.[9]

[§ 673] (d) Resale and Recovery of Difference in Price. In most jurisdictions where the purchaser refuses to complete his purchase, the executor has a remedy by making a resale and proceeding against the purchaser for the difference in price,[10] but this remedy is not exclusive and does not preclude an action for the purchase money.[11]

[§ 674] (12) Proceeds[12]—(a) Liability of Representative. An executor will be compelled to account in the probate court for the proceeds of real estate sold by him pursuant to the directions of the will,[13] and in a proper case an executor into whose hands proceeds of the sale of realty have come, or are to come, may be required to give security therefor;[14] but where a sale is made by the representative without authority, he cannot be compelled to account in his representative capacity for the proceeds.[15] Where the executor sells lands under a power conferred by the will on him personally, and not as executor, he should not include the proceeds of sale in his executor's account,[16] nor should proceeds received as trustee and not as executor be brought into the administration account.[17] So also where executors, having no power as such to sell land, sell the testator's land as agents for the devisees, they cannot be required to account as executors for the proceeds of such sales.[18]

"The proceeds of sale have not come into the hands of the executor as a part of the fund under administration. He holds them simply as one who, without warrant, has sold the property of another and is ready to account for its price. An executor can account for proceeds of the sale of lands not devised to him in trust only when he has sold them pursuant to a power of sale contained in the will, and it is not conceivable that the results of a sale for which there is no valid warrant in the will became any part of the fund intrusted to him as executor. The proceeds of a sale which the executor as such had no right to make, and which he has made only in his individual capacity, cannot be the subject of accounting in this court." [§ 675] (b) How Far Regarded as Personalty. In case of a sale of a decedent's realty there is a conversion into personalty only to the extent to which the purchase money may be required as personalty for the particular object for which the sale is made, otherwise such proceeds, although in the form of money, remain impressed with the character of realty so far as to determine who is entitled thereto.[19] Where an executor, having power to sell certain land on the death of testator's widow and divide the proceeds among testator's heirs, sold the same during the widow's life, his void deed did not convert the equitable interest of the legatees in the property, so as to compel them to interplead with the widow's representatives as to their contesting claims on the purchase money paid for such deed.[20]

[§ 676] (c) Disposition of Proceeds. Where a power of sale is lawfully exercised for certain specified purposes, it is the duty of the executor to devote the proceeds to such purposes, and to pay over the surplus, if any remains after the special purpose has been carried out, to such persons as the will intended.[21] Where the testator has authorized or directed a sale of land for the payment of debts, the money arising therefrom becomes legal assets for that purpose,[22] and it has been held that even though a sale is not made for the payment of debts the proceeds must be applied to the debts if needed therefor.[23] So also an executor who has paid out in satisfaction of decedent's debts a sum in excess of the personalty may reimburse himself from the proceeds of a sale of the realty.[24] But it has also been held that, where real estate was not converted into personalty by the terms of a will until sale thereof more than two years from the date of testator's death, the proceeds were discharged from liability for decedent's debts.[25] Where testator divided his whole estate into two parts, called "personal fund" and "real estate," and it was plainly his intention that the real estate should bear the expense of the conversion thereof into money, equity will charge such expense to the proceeds of such real estate, although there is a general provision in the will for the payment of all debts from the personal fund.[26] While money received from the sale of mortgaged land belonging to an insolvent estate cannot be taken to pay the cost of a settlement suit in which a mortgage lien is enforced, so as to leave an amount insufficient to satisfy the mortgage, if personal property is used in paying insurance, taxes, repairs, and interest on the mortgaged property to an extent exceeding what is taken to pay costs of settlement, including attorney's fee, commissioner's fee, and advertising, the mortgagee cannot complain, especially where he would have been required to pay a large part of such expenses out of the proceeds in case of foreclosure.[27] Where, after recovery of a judgment against devisees, but before execution sale thereunder the executors exercised their power of sale, the execution purchaser was not entitled to follow the fund in the executor's hands.[28] Where an executor by mistake or otherwise has sold land not belonging to his testator the true owner is entitled to the purchase money.[29]

[§ 677] (d) Liability of Purchaser as to Application of Proceeds. The general rule is that, where a purchaser from an executor who sells under a power contained in the will pays over the purchase money in good faith to his vendor, he is under no duty or obligation to see to the proper application or distribution of the money by the latter;[30] and the validity of the deed of the executor is not impaired by his using the money for a purpose other than that contemplated by the will.[31] It has been held, however, that if the debts are specific or scheduled, it becomes the duty of the purchaser to see that the purchase money is applied in satisfaction thereof.[32] Certain limitations of the rule have been recognized in England,[33] where it is held that if the power is given to sell for payment of legacies alone the purchaser is responsible for such application of the purchase money.[34] But in the United States the general rule is the same even though the sale is for payment of legacies.[35]

[§ 678] (e) Proceedings for Distribution. Equity formerly took exclusive jurisdiction over the proceeds of a sale of real estate under a will as to compelling distribution,[36] but probate courts are now vested by statute with authority over such matters.[37] In an action to sell certain real estate of decedent and to make distribution of the proceeds arising from the sale, moneys received by the executor from a sale of property under a power of sale in the will cannot be directed to be applied to the payment of the debts of the estate.[38]

[a] Payment of debts before sale.—Where the power was given to sell for the payment of both debts and legacies, but the debts had been paid at the time of the sale, and this was known to the purchaser, it was held by Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst that the rule applicable to a charge of legacies alone does not apply, because "the rule applies to the state of things at the death of the testator; and if the debts are afterwards paid, and the legacies alone are left as a charge, that circumstance does not vary the general rule." Johnson v. Kennett, 3 Myl. & K. 624, 10 EngCh 624, 631, 40 Reprint 238.

[b] There is no distinction between a case where the debts were paid after the death of the testator and before the sale by the executor, and a case where the testator left no debts. "The case must stand upon one of two grounds: either that there are no debts within the knowledge of the purchaser, and then it is indifferent whether there were no debts at the death of the testator, or no debts at the time of the purchase, or, which is more satisfactory and open to no ambiguity, on the ground that when a testator, by his will, charges his estate with debts and legacies, he shows that he means to intrust his trustees with the power of receiving the money, anticipating that there will be debts, and thus providing for the payment of them. It is by implication a declaration by the testator that he intends to intrust the trustees with the receipt and application of the money, and not to throw any obligation at all upon the purchaser or mortgagee; that intention does not cease because there are no debts; it remains just as much if there are no debts as if there are debts, because the power arises from the circumstance that the debts are provided for, there being in the very creation of the trust a clear indication amounting to a declaration by the testator that he means, and the nature of the trust shows that he means, that the trustees are alone to receive the money and apply it. In that way all the cases are reconcilable, and all stand upon one footing; namely, that if a trust be created for the payment of debts and legacies, the purchaser or mortgagee shall in no case be bound to see to the application of the money raised. This would be a consistent rule on which everybody would be able to act, authorized, too, by the words of the testator and drawing none of those fine distinctions which embarrass courts and counsel, and lead to litigation, and it is one to which I shall adhere as long as I sit in this court." [b] The interest of a pretermitted child in real estate is not divested by a conveyance of the testator's land by the executor is invalid because of a lack of power, the title remains in the heirs or devisees.[43] A sale of land by executors under a power in the will to sell for the payment of debts is good against creditors[44] and discharges the land from the lien of debts not of record,[45] or even of a judgment rendered against decedent in his lifetime.[46] A testator cannot, by any power of sale in his will, relieve his land from liability for his debts in case the personalty is insufficient to pay them,[47] and it has even been considered that a sale for purposes other than the payment of debts will not give the purchaser a title discharged from all claim and demand on account of the debts,[48] although there is also authority for the view that a bona fide purchaser from an executor who has a power of sale takes good title as against creditors of decedent,[49] whose only remedy is against the proceeds in the hands of the executor,[50] or against the executor personally in case he has misapplied the proceeds.[51] It is not necessary to the validity of an executor's sale under a power in the will to pay the mortgages and legacies that all the facts appear of record,[52] and the presumption, after a long lapse of time, is that the circumstances existed which warranted the exercise by an executor of a power of sale.[53] Where the will charges the debts generally upon the land and a sale is made with the collusion of the purchaser for the purpose of preventing the payment of the debts, the land will remain charged with the debts in the hands of the purchaser.[54] A sale by an executor pursuant to direction in the will is not invalid because of the invalidity of the testamentary directions as to the disposition of the proceeds.[55] Where the will contains a power of sale, but gives no power to mortgage the realty, a conveyance made for the purpose of indirectly subjecting the property to a mortgage is invalid.[56] An executor will not be compelled by a decree of the orphans' court to execute a deed for real estate of the testator sold by him, where it appears that some of the devisees agreed with the other devisees that the property should not be struck off below a certain price, and that the crier disregarded this understanding, and sold the property at a lower price to some of the parties to the agreement.[57] A sale can derive no aid from a power given by the will unless made under the power.[58]

Estoppel. An estoppel to complain of a sale to pay debts results from the action of heirs or devisees in joining the executor in a conveyance of land sold for this purpose.[59] Where executors sold real estate under a power in the will, and under a decree settling their accounts the cash received by such sale appeared, it did not estop one interested in the estate, having notice of such accounting, from contesting the validity of the sale, where the account did not set out the facts rendering the sale invalid, and no issue as to its validity was tendered.[60] Where one of several coexecutors executes a deed depending for its validity on the signature of all, the heirs will not be held to have acquiesced in the unauthorized act, where there is no evidence of actual notice of the execution of the deed brought home to them, and the deed is not recorded until after the execution and record of a later deed by an administrator de bonis non of the estate.[61]

Void agreement for sale. An agreement by an executor, for himself and the other executors, to sell certain land of the estate, when the executors perfected title to the property, has been held to be void, as contrary to public policy.[62] Where a conveyance was made and deed executed by executors after the will had been probated, and they were qualified and empowered to convey, it was immaterial that, before their appointment, they had made an unauthorized or void agreement to sell to the same grantee.[63]

ferred thereby is as complete an administration of the property and passes title thereto as effectually as if made under an order of court.[65] A purchaser in good faith from an executor who has power to sell gets a title and possession which is good at law, even though the sale is prematurely or indiscreetly made, or the necessity for the exercise of the power has not arisen, or the sale was made for an inadequate consideration, or in violation of the executor's duty, the relief against him, if any can be had, being only in equity and at the instance of the beneficiary whose interests have been prejudiced.[66] Neither is the purchaser's title as against beneficiaries affected by the executor's misappropriation of the proceeds.[67] But a sale of land by executors without consideration or outside the scope of the power given them by the will is void as to the immediate grantee and subsequent grantees with notice, at the suit of the estate of the testator and his creditors, or at the suit of prior judgment creditors of the beneficiaries in such estate.[68] Where on a sale of testator's real estate under a testamentary power the executors stipulated that all taxes, assessments, etc., would be allowed out of the purchase money, and the property conveyed free from all encumbrances, it was held that where seventeen years after the sale and deed an unpaid assessment which was a lien on the property was discovered, the purchaser could recover from the executors the assessment as for money had and received, although the assessment was compromised and paid by a guaranty company which had insured the title.[69]

Relation back. Where the executor is authorized to sell but not given title, the title of a purchaser from the executor relates back to the testator's death.[70]

[§ 681] (b) Rule of Caveat Emptor. A sale by an executor passes only such interest as testator had in the property,[71] and a purchaser whose deed contains no covenants to cover defects in title takes at his own risk, and unless he can show fraudulent representations upon which he relied as an inducement to his purchase, he is without remedy in case

"A sale of this character by executors or trustees under a will is in parity, on the same footing, with a judicial sale; that, where there is jurisdiction or authority to make the sale, the purchaser takes the complete title of the decedent, relieved of all burdens and liabilities of the administrator under which the sale is made, and that the purchase price or proceeds of such sale steps in and takes the place of the property so dispensed of, and which proceeds become liable for the burdens of administration, for the payment of debts, legacies, etc., and all of which in no manner concerns the purchaser at such sale, or in any manner affects his title, that the heir takes a distributive share of the proceeds, and has no title to the land after the decease of the ancestor, with the possible exception of posthumous or pretermitted children (Northrop v. Marquam, 16 Or. 173, 18 P 449). The proceeds of the land, when the sale is fair, are just as available to the creditors as the land itself. The land could only be sold once to satisfy the debts, and, when that has been fairly done by the trustees and the proceeds turned into the channels of administration for the payment of debts, it would certainly be inequitable to again charge the same land with the payment of the same debts." the title proves defective or he otherwise gets less than he expected to secure by his purchase.[72] But where the executor assures one about to purchase that he will make him a clear title and the purchase is made accordingly the purchaser is entitled to a title free from encumbrance;[73] and it has also been held that in case of a mistake, where the proceeds of the sale are still within the control of the court, relief may be granted to a purchaser.[74]

[§ 682] (c) Protection as Bona Fide Purchaser. Where one purchases land from an executor as such, he is bound to know whether or not the latter is authorized by the will to make the sale,[75] and if the executor has no such power the purchaser is not an innocent or bona fide purchaser,[76] and acquires no title.[77] But where the executor has power to sell, a purchaser from him acquires good title notwithstanding the bad faith of the executor in making the sale, where he had no knowledge of such bad faith,[78] for the purchaser has a right to presume that the executor is acting in good faith,[79] and is not bound to inquire whether a necessity for the exercise of the power given by the will exists.[80] The purchaser cannot, however, safely disregard information which he cannot avoid receiving without extraordinary negligence;[81] and if he has notice that the sale is made for a purpose other than that for which the will empowers the executor to sell, or is otherwise unauthorized, the legal title of the devisees is not divested.[82] But it has been held that where an executor sells land, in excess of the power conferred by the will, to pay debts of the testator, the purchaser is subrogated to the rights of creditors, and can hold possession of the land as security for so much of the money as was paid on the debts.[83] Where the sale is tainted with fraud and covin between the executor and the purchaser, it is absolutely void and the title to the property remains unchanged.[84]

"When a will directs the sale of real estate, if necessary, for the payment of all the testator's debts or legacies, a purchaser at any such sale, not being presumed to know, or to be able by reasonable diligence to know, the conditions of the estate or the extent of its indebtedness, or of its assets, should be protected in his purchase whenever made in good faith, without notice, actual or constructive, of the latent fact that there was no necessity for the sale, and consequent want of authority to make it." Rutherford v. Clark, supra [quot Tarpy v. Lexington, etc., R. Co., 154 Ky. 345, 347, 157 SW 728].

[a] Reason for rule.—"If this purchaser would be required to investigate, whether a necessity for a sale existed and conclude that it did exist, and the legatee differ with him in such conclusion, the validity of the title would be made to depend on the verdicts of as many juries as the parties might be able to secure in determining the very question which the testator declared should be decided by his executors. 84. Wright v. Zeigler, 1 Ga. 324, 44 AmD 656.

[§ 683] (15) Setting Aside Sale[85]—(a) Jurisdiction. Jurisdiction of the probate court to set aside an executor's sale for fraud has been denied,[86] this being a matter of which equity takes jurisdiction.[87] But under some statutes the probate court is given this jurisdiction[88] unless the circumstances are such that the estate is no longer interested.[89]

[§ 684] (b) Grounds. A sale of real estate by the executor under power conferred by a will which is imperfectly executed will be set aside.[90] Where executors empowered to sell real estate sold certain real property to a coexecutor, and the sale was confirmed without the knowledge of those interested in the estate that the coexecutor was the purchaser, those interested may sue to rescind the sale or to have it declared that the coexecutor holds title in trust for the estate.[91] A sale may be set aside because it was not adequately advertised and unfairness in the sale resulted from the fact.[92] Where a will authorized the executor to sell so much of the real estate as was necessary to pay the debts, and he sold the whole property for a sum more than three times the amount of the debts, it was held proper to set aside the sale as against a purchaser with notice.[92½]

Fraud. A false representation by the executor or administrator, selling without an order of court, to the effect that the sale is authorized by the will, entitles the purchaser who was thereby misled and induced to buy to a rescission of the contract in equity.[93] A sale may be set aside where it is made to appear that it is tainted with fraud and collusion between the executor and the purchaser by reason of which the interests of the estate or of the heirs or devisees have been injuriously affected;[94] and it has been held that the mere fact that in conducting the sale the executor placed himself in antagonism to the interests of the devisees, by collusion with the real purchaser, was sufficient to entitle the devisees to have the sale set aside whether they were in fact prejudiced or not.[95] An heir attacking a sale by an executor empowered by the will to sell real estate devised to him in trust for beneficiaries and divide the proceeds, on the ground that the power of sale had failed as to the share which passed to the heir because of the invalidity of the gift of such share, may also question the sale on the ground of the fraud of the executor.[96]

Mistake. Where a sale is made by the acre, ignorance on the part of the executor as to the exact acreage of the land sold is not such a mistake as entitles him to relief from a sale of more land than was necessary.[97]

Want or failure of consideration. Mere inadequacy of price is not usually considered a sufficient ground for setting aside a sale by an executor,[98] but it is otherwise where the inadequacy is so gross as to indicate fraud, undue advantage, improvidence, or an abuse of the power conferred;[99] and in some states the fact that on a resale a sum at least ten per cent greater than that paid at the first sale, exclusive of the expenses of the resale, can be obtained, is a sufficient ground for setting aside the sale and ordering a resale.[1] A sale may also be set

[§ 685] (c) Who May Attack Sale. Creditors,[4] legatees,[5] or distributees[6] are in such immediate interest that if the proceeds of an improper, fraudulent, or improvident sale are insufficient to settle their specific claims in full they may seek such redress; but devisees[7] or heirs[8] are usually the persons injuriously affected by an improper sale, and these may proceed by virtue of their several interests, where the sale should be set aside. Even these, however, may become estopped to attack the sale,[9] and this is the result where they have ratified or acquiesced in the sale, received their respective portions of the purchase money, or otherwise participated knowingly in the benefits of the transaction.[10] Proceedings by the executor or administrator to set aside a sale may be upheld in a case where he himself is free from fault;[11] but an executor or administrator who becomes a party to improper dealings with the estate or who himself is

The remedy of a pretermitted child, with respect to realty conveyed by the executor, is by suit to quiet title or partition or both, and not, in the absence of fraud, by a suit to set aside the conveyance.[14]

[§ 686] (d) Proceedings. A contention that a sale of real estate by an executor should be set aside because made for an inadequate sum cannot be considered on objections to his final accounting.[15] Where there is no showing that plaintiff secured any part of the purchase price, the fact that there is no offer to return the price is immaterial,[16] nor is an attempt to secure the removal of the executor a condition precedent to the exercise by creditors of an insolvent estate of their right to set aside an unauthorized sale of realty.[17] In some states there are statutes limiting the time within which an action by heirs or devisees to recover land improperly sold by an executor or administrator may be commenced,[18] and such an action may also be barred by laches.[19] A petition to set aside a sale of land which an executor had bought at his own sale will not be dismissed because another beneficiary had filed exceptions to the executor's account for the purpose of surcharging him with the profits of the sale, nor because such exceptant had joined in the petition to set aside the sale.[20] The purchaser[21] as well as the executor must be made a party to proceedings to avoid a sale of real estate made by the latter.[22] Complainant must make out a case for relief in his pleadings,[23] and a party is bound by

[b] Conduit to title to executor.—In a suit by residuary legatees to set aside a deed made by the executor to his son, who reconveyed it to his father, the son was not a necessary party because he was a mere conduit for the passing of the legal title to the father. Barnard v. Keathley, 230 Mo. 209, 130 SW 306.

22. Cowell v. South Denver Real Est. Co., 16 Colo. A. 108, 63 P 991; Dundas' App., 64 Pa. 325.

[a] Executors under superseded will.—In a bill filed after the probate of a will to recover property sold by executors appointed by a former will, previously admitted to probate, it is not necessary to make such executors parties. Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. (U. S.) 553, 16 L. ed. 770.

[b] Waiver of objection.—Where the widow and executrix is not made a party to a suit to set aside a sale by her of the testator's property to defendant under power in the will, the failure to take advantage of the defect either by demurrer or answer constitutes a waiver of the objection. Cowell v. South Denver Real Est. Co., 16 Colo. A. 108, 63 P 991.

23. Hughes v. Hughes, 87 Ala. 652, 6 S 353; Davidson v. Buchanan, 164 App. Div. 352, 149 NYS 640.

[a] Complaints held insufficient.—(1) A complaint in an action to set aside a sale of land on account of fraud, which alleged collusion between the executrix and the purchaser, by which they became jointly interested, although the deed was taken in the name of the purchaser alone; that the buyer afterward conveyed to the executrix a half interest in the lots for one half of the original purchase price; that two months thereafter they both sold the lots for a large amount; and that at the time of the first sale the price of the lots was rising and there was no necessity for the sale, which allegations were denied in the answer, did not make out a case for relief, as it failed to aver that the market price of the lots when first sold exceeded the price obtained therefor, and whether any, or what, improvements were put upon them between that time and the second sale. Hughes v. Hughes, 87 Ala. 652, 6 S 353. (2) A complaint in eject-

the admissions in his pleadings.[24] Persons complaining of the exercise of a power of sale to pay debts have the burden of showing that there were no debts when the sale was made.[25] When a representative's sale to himself is set aside by the court the annulment must be complete, it cannot be partial;[26] but a judgment setting aside such a sale affects only those who are before the court when it is rendered.[27] Where, in a suit by an heir attacking the validity of a sale by the executor under a power to sell real estate devised to him in trust and pay the proceeds to designated beneficiaries, on the ground of the invalidity in part of the gifts to the beneficiaries, the complaint alleged that the premises were so situated that a partition could not be made without prejudice to the owners thereof, and that a sale was necessary, failure to find that a sale was necessary to carry out to the best advantage the valid provisions of the will did not render erroneous a judgment adjudging the validity of the sale by the executor.[28] On setting aside a purchase by the representative at his own sale, it is the duty of the court to adjust the equities between the parties.[29] Where a will gives the executor a power of sale of land he has a right of appeal from an order setting aside a sale made under the power.[30] Where a sale is set aside, the original purchaser has no standing to question the power of the court to direct a resale.[31]

[§ 687] (16) Divested Purchaser's Rights, Remedies, and Liabilities.[32] A purchaser from an executor must rely on the covenants in his deed,[33] or upon the personal liability of the executor,[34] and cannot usually have relief against the heirs or devisees in case the property is lost to him through a defect of title or a lack of authority to sell in the executor.[35] But restitution of the purchase money or payments made is favored in equity as far as possible, where an unauthorized sale is set aside, especially if the purchaser has parted with his consideration in good faith,[36] and the estate or the beneficiaries have received benefit therefrom;[37] and where debts of the estate have been paid out of the proceeds of an invalid sale, the divested purchaser is usually held to be entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors and to be indemnified out of the land,[38] although this has been denied.[39] On the setting aside of a sale by an executor or administrator the purchaser may be called on to account for rents and profits;[40] but he has been allowed rement by a legatee against the grantees of the executors in a will authorizing them to sell the testator's real estate for the payment of debts, if the personal estate prove insufficient therefor, which does not allege that the personal estate was sufficient for the payment of the debts, and that it was unnecessary to sell the real estate, is defective, for failing to show that the exercise of the power of sale was unauthorized. Walter v. Tomkins, 71 App. Div. 21, 75 NYS 557 [aff 179 N. Y. 555 mem, 71 NE 1141 mem]. (3) Where a devisee sued to set aside transfers of real property from the executors to testator's widow and from her to others, an allegation that the latter took relying on the record title, without any allegation that they participated in an alleged fraud and conspiracy between the executors and the widow, was insufficient. Davidson v. Buchanan, 164 App. Div. 352, 149 NYS 640.

[b] A failure to allege nonacquiescence in the complaint was immaterial where the answer averred that plaintiff in a suit to set aside a sale of land acquiesced in such sale, and the replication denied the allegation. Cowell v. South Denver Real Est. Co., 16 Colo. A. 108, 63 P 991.

[b] Charging debt on land.—Where a sale by executors of the remainder interest in certain land was set aside after many years as invalid, a debt of the testator was properly fixed as a charge on such land, it appearing that such sale had been made in good faith for the purpose of paying the same. "The decree requires complainants, if they desire to subject the land to partition, to account to the estate of Sarah Stickel for the money paid by her and the debts assumed by her when the conveyance was made. It would be manifestly unjust and inequitable to permit them to take the real estate notwithstanding these deeds, and at the same time refuse to pay the money which was realized from that sale. The transaction by which the widow became the purchaser of the lands being not absolutely void, but voidable, it was the duty of the court, upon setting it aside, to adjust the equities between the parties,—and this, we think, it has fairly done." [a] Basis of accounting.—Where an executor sells lands under a defective power, the purchaser should only be required to account to the imbursements for necessary expenditures for the preservation of the property[41] and compensation for proper improvements,[42] although interest on the purchase money has been denied.[43] It has been held that where a sale of realty has been set aside because made to the representative's agent, the extent of the interest of the legatees ought to be ascertained by a proper account, so that the purchaser may if he thinks proper remove the interest by paying to them the unsatisfied parts of their legacies.[44]

[§ 688] (17) Liabilities of Executor or Administrator.[45] An executor or administrator selling land is chargeable with the consideration acknowledged or shown to have been received by him in the transaction,[46] and any profit arising from such a sale beyond his just recompense belongs properly not to the representative personally, but to those beneficially interested in the estate.[47] He is ordinarily to be charged only with what was actually obtained or received by him;[48] and as he is required to exercise, in making the sale, merely such care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise in conducting his own affairs,[49] he is not, in the absence of fraud or negligence, liable for selling at a price less than what might have been obtained.[50] But he may be surcharged in his account with such price as he ought to have obtained rather than with that which was actually realized, where culpable negligence or misconduct on his part induced a loss.[51] An agreement by an executor in a contract of sale to buy off the widow's dower right or to pay off encumbrances created by the testator binds, not the estate, but only the executor personally.[52] If the executor makes false representations concerning the land he is to sell he is personally liable;[53] but an executor who sells real estate under a power in the will does not become personally liable in case of a failure of title.[54] Executors who have conveyed under a power of sale land of which their testator was in equity a mere trustee are liable as such to the person having the equitable title to such land for the damages sustained by him to the extent of the purchase money.[55] An executor may be held personally liable for loss arising from his failure to sell land as directed in the will.[56]

"When the executor, acting under an order of the court to sell real estate, or exercising for that purpose a testamentary power like this, sells in good faith and with due regard to the duty which he owes to creditors and legatees, his duty to account is performed by charging himself with the proceeds of the sale. He thus accounts for that portion of the assets in his hands for administration. But, if such faith is not exercised, the price received does not represent the performance of his legal duty; and, if that price only is charged, there is, in that respect, a failure to account." "There is no legal theory on which either executors or trustees can presumably bind their estate by a five-years lease, or by verbal representations concerning the condition of the estate, resulting in unliquidated damages to a large amount. Without evidence of the precise character of the powers granted by the will to executors or trustees, there was nothing to found an action; and this could not be shown by parol, and was not shown at all." Weise v. Rich, 77 Mich. 325, 326, 43 NW 979, 980.

[a] Alteration of lease given by testator.—An executor has no power to alter or modify a lease executed by the testator, as this would be in effect making a new lease, without an order of the probate court under such power may exist by virtue of testamentary or statutory provisions or an order of court.[58] If such authority is conferred at all it must be strictly pursued,[59] otherwise the rights of heirs, devisees, or other beneficiaries in such property are not controlled or concluded.[60] But where the power to lease exists, an invalid option to purchase given in connection with the lease does not prevent a recovery of the rent.[61]

A power to sell does not authorize the making of a lease of the property.[62]

The acquiescence of heirs or devisees, or their waiver of their rights, may operate to validate the acts of an executor or administrator in leasing the lands of decedent;[63] but it has been held that the proceedings had for that purpose. Brosnan v. Kramer, 135 Cal. 36, 66 P 979.

[a] Implied power.—(1) A devise to executors in trust for a cestui que trust for life, and in default of issue over to a third person, with power to the executors to sell and dispose of so much of the realty as will be necessary to fulfill the will, is sufficient to authorize the executors to execute leases of the realty on such terms as are reasonable and necessary to carry into effect the testator's intention as expressed in the will. Hedges v. Riker, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 163. (2) Where a testator by his will directs that certain moneys, including the rent of his lands, be invested by his executor, there is an implied authority to the executor to lease lands. McCall v. Peachy, 3 Munf. (17 Va.) 288. (3) So also an executor has full authority to lease land devised to him in trust, with power to manage and control it, according to his own judgment and discretion, the same as the testator himself could do if living. Raynolds v. Hanna, 55 Fed. 783 [rev on other grounds 59 Fed. 923, 8 CCA 370]; Peirce v. Peirce, 195 Pa. 417, 46 A 78. (4) Where a will gives executors the discretion to sell and dispose of all or any part of the testator's real estate, and does not require sale, it is within the executor's implied power to lease the property until a sale is actually made. Moore v. Trainer, 252 Pa. 367, 97 A 462. To same effect Hedges v. Riker, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 163.

[b] An express power to lease a part may be extended by implication to all the testator's real estate. Thus, where the testator directed that his widow should cultivate as much of his land, during her life or widowhood, as she pleased, and that "the balance" should be rented out by his executors, it was held that the power of leasing extended to the whole estate, on the termination of the widow's estate for life. Hoyle v. Stowe, 13 N. C. 318.

[c] Court may order lease of mine.—Meeks v. Clear Jack Min. Co., 141 Mo. A. 648, 124 SW 1084.

[d] Lease of unopened coal mines.—Where the chief if not the sole value of land is for coal mining purposes, and the only profit to be derived therefrom is by sale or lease of the coal, either of which the executor in his discretion has power to do, the fact that the coal mines were not opened in the life of the testator does not affect the authority of the executor to lease the same, so as to make the rental thereof income of the estate. Raynolds v. Hanna, 55 Fed. 783 [rev on other grounds 59 Fed. 923, 8 CCA 370].

[e] Construction of power.—Where a testator directed that his widow should cultivate as much of his land during her life or widowhood as she pleased, and empowered his executors to rent out the balance, the executors had power on her decease to lease the whole of the premises. Hoyle v. Stowe, 13 N. C. 318.

[f] Oil and gas lease.—Where a resident of Ohio, owning a farm in Kansas that had never been used for other than agricultural purposes, executed a will therein providing that the executor and trustee should take charge of the said premises, and "lease and maintain the same in repair and good condition, with a view to obtain the best income therefrom without permitting the same to deteriorate in value or quality," the executor and trustee was not authorized to execute an oil and gas lease granting to the lessee all the oil and gas under such premises, and bind the legatees thereby. Lanyon Zinc Co. v. Freeman, 68 Kan. 691, 75 P 995, 1 AnnCas 403.

[g] Leases under order of court of equity.—In a suit in equity by the heirs at law against the widow of decedent who is also administratrix of his estate and who claims an interest in the real property, it is the duty of the court not only to protect the rights of decedent, but also the rights of creditors; and it has jurisdiction to authorize the administratrix to lease the property during the pendency of the litigation. Ex p. Barker, 127 Ala. 203, 28 S 574.

[h] Acknowledgment of lease by married executrix.—An executrix who while sole enters into an agreement to lease land belonging to the estate is competent to acknowledge the lease for registration after her marriage, without being privily examined, for such lease does not convey any interest of hers. Darden v. Neuse, etc., Steam-Boat Co., 107 N. C. 437, 12 SE 46.

[a] Perpetual lease.—A power to sell real estate in order to pay debts, and to divide the estate, given by will does not authorize executors to make a perpetual lease with privilege of purchase. trustees of a residuary estate are not estopped to maintain an action to enjoin the executrix from leasing and collecting rents from residuary real estate by acquiescence in previous acts of the executrix of the same character.[64]

Upholding lease as individual lease. Where a widow and executrix who was also the sole legatee and devisee, except as to two dollars left to testator's children, executed a lease to property styling herself "administratrix and executrix" of the estate, without any order of court, it was held that as the property had become hers under the will, and the lease thus became her individual contract, she could elect to treat the words "administratrix and executrix" as words of personal description, so that the lease should be good as her individual lease.[65]

Appointment of receiver to rent land. In a case where a large amount of vacant land formed a part of the estate, it was held proper to appoint a receiver to rent the land, pending an action by the executor to construe the will, to allot dower to the widow, and to settle the estate.[66]

[§ 690] b. Term. Leases by executors or administrators, when authorized, should ordinarily be for short terms,[67] although a long lease may be sustained if it is in conformity with the local system and beneficial to the inheritance.[68] A statute providing that no executor shall rent the real estate, unless ordered by the probate court to do so for a term not exceeding two years, does not mean that the executor, at the expiration of two years from the date of the order of court, ipso facto loses all control or interest in the land, but only that he may not rent the land for a longer term.[69] Under statutes restricting the power to lease to the period allowed for the settlement of an estate, any lease made for a definite term is subject to termination by the final settlement of the estate and discharge of the representative.[70]

[§ 691] c. Recovery of Rent. A power in the personal representative to lease carries with it the power to receive and collect rent;[71] and a tenant who takes possession under a lease from the representative cannot in an action against him for rent dispute the representative's power to make the contract.[72] A lessee from an executor cannot purchase judgments against the testator and set them off against the rent unless the executor acknowledges a sufficiency of assets to pay all the debts of the estate.[73]

[§ 692] d. Recovery of Possession. The personal representative is the proper person to bring an action to recover possession from a tenant holding under a lease from him, while the estate remains unsettled.[74]

[§ 693] e. Actions for Waste. Although an executor who has no interest as reversioner cannot maintain an action against a lessee for waste committed on premises leased by him,[75] he may maintain an action on covenants in the lease against committing waste.[76]

[§ 694] f. Rights of Lessee. An executor's or administrator's lease does not imply any covenant of quiet enjoyment;[77] and if the lessee loses part or all of the land he cannot recover back from the estate the rent paid or any portion thereof.[78]

[§ 695] g. Liability of Representative. If the representative rents out the land of his decedent he holds the rent collected as assets of the estate, and for the use of those legally entitled to it,[79] and he cannot escape liability therefor by setting up that he leased the land without authority.[80] He is not liable for losses of rent which could not have been avoided by the exercise of good faith and ordinary prudence and diligence,[81] but for losses resulting from his fraud or culpable negligence, whether in reference to collection, taking security, or other-

[a] Acceptance of rent. — (1) Where an executor, assuming to act as agent for the beneficiaries, made a five-year lease of property belonging to the estate, the acceptance by the beneficiaries of rents under the lease was a ratification of the lease; it was not previously authorized by them. Phillips v. Grubbs, 112 Ark. 562, 167 SW 101. Manion v. Lambert, 10 Bush. (Ky.) 295.

[b] Lease by executor under will subsequently set aside.—Where an executor, acting under a will which was afterward set aside, leased the land of his supposed testator for a year, and the tenant enjoyed the demised premises without interruption, neither the administrator subsequently appointed nor the heir of the intestate could maintain an action against the tenant for use and occupation. His deed is in fact but a quitclaim deed, and so it is uniformly held touching such sales that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies. . . . The same principle applies in case of lease. It is but an estate for years, carved out of and dependent upon the sufficiency of the title of the larger estate of the deceased. In this respect there is no distinction between a lease by an administrator and lease by a guardian; and it is uniformly held that a guardian's lease does not imply any covenant of quiet enjoyment. . . . Moreover, an administrator cannot contract so as to make his estate liable, except as authorized by statute. . . . Gray, as administrator, had the power to make this lease . . . but in leasing he carved out an estate for years from such title and interest only as were in the estate of Turner").

Harrison v. Harrison, 39 Ala. 489.

[a] Where an executor was given wise, he is liable.[82] An administrator who has power to rent out real estate, but through whose negligence it is not rented, is chargeable with the rental value;[83] but where executors are given a naked power to sell real estate, without the legal title or the right to possession, they are not liable for the rents which might have been made by leasing the same until a sale could be made.[84] Where an executor contracts to lease the real estate, under a power in the will, and dies before performance, his own estate is not liable for the breach.[85] A devisee of an undivided interest in land who, as tenant in common, takes possession and leases the whole property, assuming to act as executor, but without express testamentary authority so to lease, is personally bound.[86]

[§ 696] 12. Mortgage[87]—a. Authority in General. The personal representative cannot, merely by virtue of his office, mortgage the lands of his decedent,[88] but authority to do so is frequently conferred by will, or by statute authorizing this to be done pursuant to an order of or license from the probate court.[89] A power to mortgage need not be expressed in the will, but may be implied from a discretion as to renting land, he was not liable for renting it at one hundred dollars to one hundred and fifty dollars per year, although he might possibly have been able to rent it at two hundred dollars to three hundred and fifty dollars per year. Dockins v. Vass, (Ky.) 124 SW 290.

[b] Amount of rent not the only consideration.—Where an executor leases property belonging to the testator, it does not follow that he should lease to those who offer to pay the highest rent; but the purposes for which the property is to be used, the responsibility of the lessee, the length of time for which he may agree to lease, and many other circumstances of the kind must necessarily be taken into consideration. [a] Power broad enough to authorize mortgage.—(1) A power authorizing an executor to continue the testator's business for a season, and to exercise his own judgment in the management and sale of the estate in order to pay testator's debts, and to sell or mortgage the property if necessary to secure debts, which he was authorized to renew, was sufficiently broad to authorize the executor to mortgage certain of testator's real estate to a bank to secure a note made for money borrowed to discharge the indebtedness of the estate. Talliferro v. Thornton, 80 SW 1097, 26 KyL 183. (2) A will authorized testator's wife, as executrix, to sell such property as she might deem best, real or personal, to pay off his indebtedness, and provided that she should not give bond or render account. Another clause bequeathed one dollar each to his children, and another bequeathed the balance to his wife during her natural life, "granting her full power and absolute authority to dispose of all or so much as she desires and as might be necessary to provide for her and the children during her life," and at her death the "residue if any" to be divided among the children. The executrix sold for testator's indebtedness all but three town lots, on one of which was a hotel; the other two producing no revenue. It was held that the executrix had power to encumber the hotel property to meet the indebtedness of the testator, she retaining possession and making it her home, and it appearing that a sale would not leave sufficient property to support her. Dewein v. Hooss, 237 Mo. 23, 139 SW 195.

[b] Construction of testamentary power.—Where a testator provided by his will, first, that all his debts be paid out of the first realized assets of his estate, second, that his executor stand in his place, for the purpose of managing his property, in such way as to realize the best income therefrom, and in paying off the indebtedness on the land, and third, that his executor, for the purpose expressed in the second clause, have full power to make loans for the pur-

the powers and instructions given therein to the executor,[90] and an express power may be extended by implication to property other than that designated.[91] A power given by will can, of course, be exercised only when the circumstances contemplated by the will arise,[92] and for the purposes for which it is given,[93] and the same is true of a statutory power.[94] Where power to mortgage is given to the pose of meeting said indebtedness on said land, and to execute mortgages on a certain part of the land, and to execute such papers as should be for the best interest of the estate, testator's intention was that mortgages be given only for meeting indebtedness on the real estate. Iowa Loan, etc., Co. v. Holderbaum, 86 Iowa 1, 52 NW 550.

[c] Equity may authorize a mortgage instead of a sale of lands expressly charged by the will with the payment of testator's debts. Loebenthal v. Raleigh, 36 N. J. Eq. 169.

[d] Remarriage of executrix.—Where a testator appointed his widow executrix and guardian of their minor children, gave the entire estate for her own use, and the residue to the children on her death or remarriage, and authorized the executrix to mortgage and convey the whole of testator's property as she should deem best for carrying the provisions of the will into effect, a mortgage executed by her after remarriage was valid, in the absence of proof that it was for any other purpose than to carry out the provisions of the will, or that the mortgagee was chargeable with notice. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Shipman, 108 N. Y. 19, 15 NE 58.

[e] Consent to mortgage of heir's interest.—Where a will provided that the executor should keep the property together, until a granddaughter should become of age, unless he should think it would be better for all the heirs to make an earlier division, such power did not authorize the executor to consent to a mortgage of the undivided interest of one of the heirs prior to the granddaughter's arrival at majority. Garman v. Hawley, 132 Mich. 321, 93 NW 871.

[f] Persons nominated as executors but who have not qualified have no power to execute a mortgage of the testator's real estate to secure a debt owing by him, even though the will gives the executors as such power to sell and convey real estate and make such provision for the payment of debts as they deem best. Andrews v. Minor, 58 SW 443, 22 KyL 561.

[g] Power not in conflict with statute.—A power given by will to mortgage the testator's real estate for the payment of his debts does not conflict with a statute providing that if the personal estate of a decedent shall be inadequate to satisfy his debts a sufficient portion of the real estate may be ordered to be sold for that purpose. Ames v. Holderbaum, 44 Fed. 224; Iowa Loan, etc., Co. v. Holderbaum, 86 Iowa 1, 52 NW 550.

[h] A temporary administrator cannot institute a proceeding to mortgage land for the payment of debts. The statute only authorizes such a proceeding by the executor or administrator other than the temporary administrator, or by a creditor. Duryea v. Mackey, 151 N. Y. 204, 45 NE 458.

[i] Wills not giving power to mortgage.—(1) A testamentary provision that it is the wish of testatrix that certain realty be retained by her executor, as the investment of the principal of the trust, "so long as the same may be expedient in a judicious administration" of her estate, does not authorize him to mortgage it, but is simply a request to defer a sale so long as practicable under the law. Brown v. Brown, 70 N. H. 623, 47 A 591. (2) A provision in a will that certain real estate be retained "so long as the same may be expedient in a judicial administration" of the estate is simply a request that the executor should defer a sale so long as practicable under the law relating to the settlement of estates and does not authorize him to mortgage the property. Brown v. Brown, 70 N. H. 623, 47 A 591. (3) A clause in a will providing that the executor shall keep the real estate together for a designated period of time, unless he shall think it better to make an earlier division, confers only a power of division, and does not authorize the executor to direct or consent to a mortgage of the undivided interest of a devisee. Garman v. Hawley, 132 Mich. 321, 93 NW 871, 9 DetroitLegN 630.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Executors have implied power to mortgage the real estate of the testator in order to pay pressing claims against the estate, where all the residuary estate was devised to them, and full power given to them by the will to settle the testator's accounts and to wind up his affairs, "and, in doing so, to make any sales and arrangements they or he shall judge expedient." In re Jones, 59 L. J. Ch. 31, 33. (2) They also have power to mortgage real estate where they are directed to manage it in such a way as to make it as productive as possible, and to this end are given the power to sell and convey such parts of it as they in their discretion may deem necessary to accomplish the purpose in question. Starr v. Moulton, 97 Ill. 525. (3) Or where they are given authority, without the intervention of the court, to manage and control the estate in their discretion for the interest of the testator's children, and to "sell, exchange, and dispose of" it as they may deem necessary for such interest, the power to mortgage is implied. Faulk v. Dashiell, 62 Tex. 642, 50 AmR 542. (4) The power may also be inferred merely from the expressed intention of the testator that his estate should be administered without the aid of any court. Miller v. Borst, 11 Wash. 260, 39 P 662.

[b] The power to raise money for payment of debts in such way as an executor shall deem best, necessarily implies authority to secure the loan by mortgage. It also implies authority to enter into a contract binding the estate for repayment of the loan, including attorneys' fees and costs in case the debt has to be collected by suit, where such provisions are not improper or unusual. Fletcher v. American Trust, etc., Co., 111 Ga. 300, 36 SE 767, 78 AmSR 164. To same effect as to statutory power to mortgage. Lowrey v. Sterling, 41 Or. 518, 69 P 460.

[c] A will authorizing the executor to carry on the testator's business and conferring unlimited power of control and management authorizes him to mortgage real estate used in the business to secure its indebtedness. Roberts v. Hale, 124 Iowa 296, 99 NW 1075, 1 AnnCas 940.

91. Brown v. Morrill, 45 Minn. 483, 491, 48 NW 328 (where a will gave power to the executors to join with the testator's copartner in the execution of any mortgages that might become necessary for the proper conduct of the firm business, "for the sale or mortgaging of firm's pine lands and stumpage, for the purpose of borrowing money for said business, and renewing and continuing any firm indebtedness," the will did not limit the authority to the mortgaging of the pine lands and stumpage).

92. Smith v. Peyrot, 201 N. Y. 210, 94 NE 662 [rev 134 App. Div. 954, 118 NYS 1143 (aff 116 NYS 543)].

[a] Circumstances not showing necessity for exercise of power.—A testatrix, after making specific bequests, gave the residue of her estate to her five children to be divided equally, except that two thousand dollars was to be deducted from one of the shares, and the executors were empowered to sell or mortgage the real property "for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this instrument." After the debts and the specific legacies were paid, the executors sought to mortgage the real estate to raise funds to loan or advance to the heirs. It was held that the necessity for the exercise of the power did not exist, and that a mortgage of the realty was beyond the power of the executors. Smith v. Peyrot, 201 N. Y. 210, 94 NE 662 [rev 134 App. Div. 954, 118 NYS 1143 (aff 116 NYS 543)].

93. Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund, etc., Co. v. Lewis, 190 Pa. 558, 42 A 1094.

[a] Illustration.—A power to mortgage "for the payment of my debts and purposes of my estate" confers no authority on an executrix to mortgage to obtain funds to carry on the business of the decedent, where she is empowered by the will to carry it on for her sole and separate use and benefit; or to pay taxes, interest, and repairs for which she is personally liable as life tenant. Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund, etc., Co. v. Lewis, 190 Pa. 558, 42 A 1094.

94. See cases infra this note.

[a] Purposes for which mortgage proper.—(1) Under a statute authorizing the execution of a mortgage for the "purpose of paying the debts against the estate of any deceased person," the probate court may authorize a mortgage for the payment of debts and charges accruing after the decease of testator. Long v. Landman, 118 Mich. 174, 76 NW 374. (2) Under a statute authorizing executors and administrators to mortgage estate real property for the purpose of funding the estate debt, an administrator may mortgage estate real property to secure money to pay estate indebtedness, although it con-executor, it is not exhausted by a single exercise, but he may execute successive mortgages on the property.[95]

A naked power to sell does not, according to the weight of authority include a power to mortgage,[96] although the contrary view has been asserted in some cases,[97] and a limitation is asserted in other cases which hold that if the power to sell was for the payment of debts, or of a specific charge, and the property was devised subject thereto, a power to mortgage may be implied from the power to sell, unless the will shows a contrary intent.[98]

Consent or acquiescence of the beneficiaries may validate a mortgage executed by the personal representative without authority.[99]

"There is some conflict in the authorities on this question, but we believe that the better reasoning, if not the weight of authority, is to the effect that a mere power of sale does not include a power to mortgage. . . . This results from the fact that a mortgage is regarded as a security for debt rather than a conditional estate, and hence its execution is regarded as creating an incumbrance rather than as transferring the title. That is to say, a mortgage is treated as a mere security for a debt, and the legal estate can only be used for the purpose of enforcing the payment of the debt secured. The cardinal principle that governs in the construction of powers is to effectuate the intention of the donor; but we cannot gather from the terms of the will any intention on the part of the testator looking to a mortgage of his estate. The will does not in express terms authorize the executors either to borrow money or to mortgage the real estate. By the terms of the will, the executors were directed to close up the estate as speedily as possible, and to pay the debts of the testator and the legacies named in the will promptly. The testator anticipated that the whole estate might be necessary to pay all the legacies and to pay his debts. Therefore, in the last clause of his will he provided that if his estate was not sufficient to pay all the legacies after the payment of his debts, the legacies should be proportionately reduced. All this precludes the supposition that a mortgage was ever within the intention of the testator. See Williamson v. Grider, 97 Ark. 588, 135 SW 361. And as we have already seen, a power of sale does not include the power to mortgage except in those states where a mortgage is characterized as a conditional sale instead of being regarded as a security for a debt." Heiseman v. Lowenstein, 113 Ark. 404, 416, 169 SW 224, AnnCas1916C 601.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Where real estate was specifically devised, without authority to the executors to encumber the same to raise money to pay debts, the executors were only authorized to sell so much thereof as necessary to pay debts, and could not encumber the same. Leavell v. Grasty, 114 Va. 763, 77 SE 605. (2) An executor empowered by the testator to sell his home place, if necessary for the maintenance of his widow and children, and invest in a less expensive home, had no power to mortgage the home place to provide for the maintenance of the widow and children. Miller v. Mook, 5 KyL 327.

[b] A power to "dispose of" realty does not include the power to mortgage. Rutherford Land, etc., Co. v. Sannstock, 60 N. J. Eq. 471, 46 A 648 [disappr as to this point but aff (Ch.) 44 A 938].

[c] A power to sell for the purpose of making a division of the proceeds among the devisees does not authorize the executors to mortgage it to secure money borrowed by them. Smith v. Hutchinson, 108 Ill. 662.

[d] A power to sell real estate and invest the proceeds does not authorize the executor to mortgage the land for the purpose of raising money, and the approval by the court of such proceedings will not render it valid, but the estate having received the money advanced on such mortgage will be required to repay it with legal interest. Deery v. Hamilton, 41 Iowa 16.

[e] The true principle is, that a power to sell and convey may include the power to mortgage, but it does not necessarily do so; and whether such power is or is not included depends upon the character of the estate, the words granting the power, and the purpose for which the debt was created. [a] Thus, (1) power to mortgage real estate was given by a will by which the testator devised to his wife his entire estate, "giving her full power to sell and convey the same by deed (part or all of it), and the proceeds thereof are to be used for her comfort, and otherwise as she may think proper," and at her death the residue not specifically disposed of by her to be kept for the benefit of the testator's children. Kent v. Morrison, 153 Mass. 137, 26 NE 427, 25 AmSR 616, 10 LRA 756. (2) So also where testator devised all his property to his wife to sell for the payment of his debts, and the next clause of the will was as follows: "Also I do constitute and make Elizabeth my wife, and Thomas Woods of Willingham, my executors, whom I do appoint to sell and dispose of all my estates and chattels, in such manner and form as they shall jointly agree upon; or not to sell, if it seems most advisable to keep them, or in any way that they shall think proper, so that every creditor have his money; and if sold, all overflush to my wife, towards her support and her family, if any there be, after paying my brother for his trouble and all other debts whatsoever," it was held that the will gave to the executors a discretion to mortgage as well as to sell for the payment of debts. Woods v. Woods, 1 Myl. & C. 401, 13 EngCh 401, 40 Reprint 429. (3) Where legacies are made a charge on the real estate and the will gives a power to sell for the purpose of satisfying them and a power to mortgage "for the purpose of facilitating the management, preservation, and productiveness" of the estate, a mortgage is authorized to satisfy the legacies, where such course conserves and advances the interests concerned. Freifeld v. Mankowski, 37 Misc. 303, 306, 75 NYS 454. (4) Power to mortgage real estate was given by a will which authorized the testator's widow to sell and dispose of it as she might deem best for the support of herself and family, and carry on the business of the testator. Lardner v. Williams, 98 Wis. 514, 519, 74 NW 346 ("In so holding, we are not to be understood as holding that a simple power of sale will authorize a mortgage. This is a question upon which the decisions are not uniform").

[b] "Where power of sale is given to raise a particular charge only, and the purpose can be answered better by mortgage than by sale, and that method is not violative of the intention of the grantor of the power, the former mode of raising the money should be preferred to the latter, for the obvious and sufficient reason that it is for the advantage of the estate that it should be adopted, and it is within the limits of the power intended to be conferred. It would be absurd, to say the least of it, to adhere so closely to the literal terms of the grant of power as to necessitate a sacrifice of the property, when by a reasonable construction that result could be avoided." Loebenthal v. Raleigh, 36 N. J. Eq. 169, 172.

99. Shimmel v. Morse, 57 App. Div. 434, 63 NYS 322, 68 NYS 1148 [aff 30 Misc. 257, 63 NYS 322].

[a] Assent of principal legatee.—Where the principal legatee in a will,

Mortgage. It has been held that authority given to the representative by will or by statute to mortgage the realty authorizes him to stipulate for the payment of attorney's fees in the event of its becoming necessary to collect the debt by suit.[1] An executor giving a mortgage on his testator's property may in England include a power of sale.[2]

[§ 698] c. Construction of Mortgage. Whether or not a mortgage is that of the representative as such, or simply his individual mortgage, should, in a jurisdiction under the statutes of which a mortgage is not an instrument under seal, be determined not only from the form of the instrument itself, but by reading it in the light of the facts and circumstances attending its execution, and considering the situation of the parties.[3]

[§ 699] d. Title, Rights, and Liabilities of Mortgagee. The rule of caveat emptor applies to mortgagees of property from executors or administrators,[4] and where a mortgagee lends prematurely or the transaction is unauthorized, he obtains no title or security as against a subsequent purchaser,[5] although he will be entitled to repayment out of the proceeds of the sale.[6] A bona fide mortgagee who advances upon the security of a decedent's land is not bound to see to the representative's application of the fund realized by the mortgage,[7] nor does the fact that payment of claims against the land of a testator was made by the executor without the approbation of the court affect the validity of a mortgage given under a power in the will to secure the loan with which such payment was made.[8] But where a mortgagee lends under such circumstances that he is chargeable with constructive notice of the executor's intention to apply the money to an improper purpose, he cannot hold the mortgage as against the estate.[9]

[§ 700] e. Right to Attack Mortgage. Where property charged with the payment of a legacy was sold, and the proceeds paid to the legatee in partial discharge of the legacy, neither she nor a judgment creditor nor residuary devisees named in the will were entitled, in the absence of fraud on the part of the executors, to object to the validity of a mortgage executed by them on land belonging to the estate without express authority in the will, all of the proceeds of such mortgage having been applied to pay debts of the estate.[10]

Estoppel. Creditors of a testator may by their acquiescence for a number of years in the executor's management of the estate under the provisions of the will become estopped to question the validity of mortgages executed by him under authority given by the will;[11] but although an administrator by mortgaging the land of decedent, title to which had not been perfected, was enabled to purchase it for the heirs, the latter are not estopped in an action to foreclose the mortgage to plead the invalidity of the administrator's act because of the benefits resulting to them, it appearing that the money was not borrowed by the heirs or by anyone in their name or at their request.[12]

[§ 701] f. Personal Liability of Representative. It has been held that where an executor, empowered by a will to mortgage his testator's property, executes a mortgage in his capacity as executor containing warranties of title and a promise to pay taxes and attorney's fees, and gives his notes for the money secured thereby, he is personally bound therefor, as giving the notes and making the warranties are not necessary to the execution of the power.[13] Executors of a grantee of mortgaged premises, who executed a mortgage extension agreement, have been held individually liable for payment of the mortgage debt, and a deficiency judgment resulting from a sale of the premises, although the agreement described them as executors.[14]

[§ 702] g. Effect of Unauthorized Mortgage. Where a mortgage was unauthorized, the fact that the money lent thereon was used to pay debts of the estate gives the lender no equitable lien on the mortgaged property or other assets,[15] but under such circumstances the estate is bound in equity to re-whose interest was prior to that of all other beneficiaries, and was greater than the part of the estate mortgaged by the executor to secure a loan to pay debts, did not object to such mortgage, but joined therein with the executor, it was immaterial to the rights of the other beneficiaries whether the mortgage was authorized by the will. 15. Putney v. Bryan, 142 Ga. 118, 82 SE 519; Henry v. Henry, 73 Nebr. 746, 102 NW 441.

[a] Subrogation not permitted.—One who has made a loan to an ad-pay the amount advanced with interest.[16] A mortgage executed without authority by an executor who is also interested in the estate, while not binding upon the estate is, it has been held, binding upon him personally to the extent of his individual interest in the property.[17] In a case where one executor mortgaged land of the estate to his coexecutor, it was held that the legal effect of the mortgage was to enable the mortgagee to hold the estate in his own right as against the executor who made the mortgage, but that he was a trustee so far as the beneficiaries under the will were concerned.[18]

[§ 703] 13. Acquisition by Representative[19]—a. In His Individual Capacity—(1) In General. The office of an executor or administrator does not per se disable him as an individual from buying bona fide with his own money property to which the estate has no right,[20] and the heirs or devisees cannot compel him to give them the benefit of such a purchase, even though decedent in his lifetime had been in negotiation for the purchase of the same property.[21] But his duty does preclude him from purchasing an outstanding adverse title to land of which his decedent died seized and claiming title to such land for his own benefit,[22] and any title so acquired by him will inure to the benefit of the estate;[23] and generally speaking, where he buys or redeems land with funds of the estate, or procures judgment satisfied from land in right of the estate, or in dereliction of duty abuses the confidence reposed in him by seeking an undue personal advantage in the acquisition of property from the exercise of his representative authority, he will be considered in equity, whatever may have been the formal expression of the conveyance or of notes given for the purchase money, as holding the property in his representative capacity or as a trustee of the estate and those in interest, and his acts will inure to the benefit of those interested therein, at the same time that his rights and title are effective as against others.[24] So an administrator has no right to purchase land in his own right at a sheriff's sale under ministrator upon a void mortgage, a part of which was used to pay a previously executed void mortgage, is not entitled to subrogation to a lien discharged with the proceeds of the earlier mortgage. Henry v. Henry, 73 Nebr. 746, 103 NW 441.

[a] Mortgage by executors and devisees.—A mortgage executed upon the estate of a decedent by devisees under his will, some of whom are executors of his estate and sign as such, but who have no authority from the probate court so to do, is a valid instrument, binding the respective obligors, including the executors, in their individual capacity, and constitutes a lien upon the respective interests of the mortgagors in the mortgaged estate. Berryman v. McDonald, 49 Tex. Civ. A. 81, 107 SW 944.

[b] The administrator of a deceased vendor. (1) may purchase from the purchaser the land conveyed to him, the vendor's estate having no interest therein. Davis v. Ragland, 42 Tex. Civ. A. 400, 93 SW 1099. (2) An administrator de bonis non could purchase for himself at foreclosure sale property formerly owned by his intestate but transferred by him during his lifetime. Abernathie v. Rich, 256 Ill. 166, 99 NE 883.

[c] Where the testator had bought land the title to which was wholly void, and not merely defective, the land being public land, the executor could purchase it for his own benefit when it was sold by the government, and it was immaterial that the vendor of the testator (supposing, but without any contract or agreement with the executor, that the latter was acting for the estate) assisted in clearing away preemption rights, and otherwise facilitated the executor in getting the title. Glenn v. Thistle, 23 Miss. 42.

[d] Purchase of property of decedent's debtor.—Pending a suit in equity brought by an executor to subject land of his testator's debtor to the payment of the debt, the vendor of the land to the debtor obtained a decree for the sale of the land for a balance of the purchase money, and at the sale the executor bought the land. He afterward sold it and applied a portion of the proceeds to the payment of the debt due his testator, leaving a balance in his hands more than sufficient to reimburse him for his purchase. It was held that he was bound to apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt, but was entitled to retain the surplus profits. Longest v. Tyler, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 192.

[e] Purchase at foreclosure of mortgage due estate.—"A purchase by an executor or administrator under foreclosure of a mortgage due the estate is not absolutely void against the whole world, whether the purchase be in his individual name or as executor or administrator." Buckingham v. Wesson, 54 Miss. 526. (2) But if he purchases lands or other property with the money of the estate, and afterward resells it at a profit, the benefit of the purchase inures to the estate and not to himself individually. [c] The heirs may bring trespass to try title after the estate has been administered as to land conveyed to executions issued upon a judgment in his own favor and one held by him as administrator.[25] Where one named as executrix does not qualify or assume to act as such, she cannot be held as a trustee merely because she is made the grantee in a deed conveying land to which the testator held a bond for a deed, no part of the funds of the estate having been used in the purchase of such land.[26] Where a deed absolute in form, but intended as a mortgage, runs to the grantee individually, but is made in fact for the benefit of the estate of which she is administratrix, she must, on a bill to redeem, account for the rents and profits as administratrix.[27]

Ratification or acquiescence. Ratification by heirs or other parties in interest, or long acquiescence with full knowledge of the facts, may estop them to object to the acquisition of property of the estate by the representative, and debar third persons from questioning the transaction.[28]

[§ 704] (2) Purchase from Widow, Heir, or Devisee.[29] It is generally considered that an executor or administrator, acting fairly in the premises, may purchase from an heir or devisee, or from the widow of the decedent, his or her interest in the estate,[30] and although such a purchase is regarded with high disfavor,[31] and will be held invalid if the representative has taken any advantage of his position or been guilty of any fraud or misrepresentation,[32] the judicial disposition is usually to do no more than presume strongly against the validity of such a purchase and require the fiduciary to show affirmatively adequacy of consideration and the general fairness of the transaction,[33] and if the transaction is in good faith and without fraud it the representative. Easterling v. Blythe, 7 Tex. 210, 56 AmD 45.

[d] Right as against creditors.—Where a purchaser of land under a bond for title made permanent improvements upon the land, which so greatly enhanced its value that it became unquestionably worth considerably more than the amount of the purchase-money debt, and then died, his estate, although no portion of the purchase money had been paid, had an equitable interest in the property, which his administrator could not, as against the rights of creditors, lawfully acquire by paying the purchase money, and taking to himself personally a deed from the original vendor. Whiddon v. Williams, 98 Ga. 310, 24 SE 437.

[e] Right of purchaser.—A purchaser of lands of a testator from the executrix with notice that she had purchased them with assets of the estate is a trustee for testator's creditors to the extent that the lands were paid for by the executrix with such assets. Buckingham v. Wesson, 54 Miss. 526.

[f] A compromise between an administratrix and the heirs by which the heirs on certain considerations give a receipt "in full satisfaction of all liabilities" incurred by the administratrix on account of matters connected with the estate "discharging her from her trust as administratrix" changes her bare title as trustee of certain lands purchased by her individually with assets of the estate into a fee simple. [a] Illustrations.—(1) Where an administratrix purchased in her own behalf at a judicial sale land belonging to the estate, and the heirs at law remained silent for nearly forty years, they ratified the purchase. Prewitt v. Morgan, (Ky.) 119 SW 174 (the heirs having elected to ratify the administratrix's purchase, their title passed to her, and any claim they had in respect thereto was personal against her so long as it remained unextinguished by satisfaction or limitation). (2) In an action by the heirs of an estate to declare a lien in their favor on a certain lot, alleged to have been purchased and improved by defendant administratrix with funds of the estate, and mortgaged by her to her codefendants to secure her individual debt to them, there is no error in a decree applying the rents of the lot to the satisfaction of the mortgage, as the heirs, by electing to have a lien declared on the lot instead of claiming the lot itself, confirm the title of the administratrix to it. Dowdall v. Cannedy, 32 Ill. A. 207.

[b] Circumstances not showing

[§ 705] (3) Purchase of Decedent's Realty at Judicial or Execution Sale. With reference to an executor or administrator purchasing land of decedent for himself at a judicial or execution sale, the rule is that he shall not be allowed to purchase property which he holds in trust, either directly or indirectly, or to antagonize the interests of the estate he represents by taking an adverse interest,[35] especially where the sale was made in consequence of his default in not paying the debt for which the property was sold, when he had sufficient funds in his hands for that purpose,[36] or where he was guilty of fraud.[37] But in cases where the representative was not a trustee of the real estate at the time of the purchase, and the transaction was a fair one, and the sale was not due to any neglect or failure of duty on his part, a purchase by him has been allowed to stand.[38] Where the property is purchased at the sale by a third person, who makes the purchase in good faith, there is no reason why the administrator should not subsequently purchase the property from him.[39] Where certain land of a purchase by executor from legatee.— Where a legatee sold land to one who, after holding it for eighteen years, transferred it to the executor in a proceeding for an accounting, and it appeared that at the time of the sale the legatee requested the executor to buy the land, and approved the sale to the person who did buy, the act of the executor in taking title was not sufficient to show that he was himself the real purchaser at the first sale. [b] In whose favor trust results; participation in fraud.—A decedent's widow and his administrator agreed to procure a foreclosure sale of the intestate's land, at which the administrator was to buy the land at an inadequate price by giving out at the sale that he was purchasing for the widow, and thus dissuading others from bidding. Thereafter the administrator purchased the land at the sale and agreed to convey it to the widow for the price at which it was struck off to him. On his refusal subsequently to do so, the widow and the intestate's only child filed a bill to redeem. [a] Thus the court has upheld a purchase by the administrator of his decedent's realty at a tax sale, as he was under no obligation to pay taxes assessed against the land. Stark v. Brown, 101 Ill. 395, 401 ("His purchase conflicting with no duty he owed the heirs at law in regard to the land, in allowing it to be made, no temptation is afforded to a betrayal of trust").

[b] An executor who is also a legatee can purchase lands of the estate sold on foreclosure, in the absence of bad faith, and where he has no money of the estate in his hands to prevent the sale, and uses no portion of the estate to pay for the property. Connor v. Gibbons, 228 Pa. 617, 77 A 1009.

[c] A mortgagee who becomes administrator of the estate of the mortgagor does not thereby lose the right to foreclose his mortgage, or to purchase the property at the foreclosure sale, when he acts fairly and in good faith. Fleming v. McCutcheon, 85 Minn. 152, 88 NW 433 (where the purchase was for the full amount due on the mortgage, with the costs of foreclosure). But compare King v. Turner, 112 Ark. 337, 165 SW 949 (the mortgagee under a deed of trust who became mortgagor's administrator with the will annexed, had the right to have the mortgaged lands sold under the deed of trust, but not to become the purchaser, but holding further that such purchase was not invalid, where the devisee without any fraud or undue influence being practiced, asked him to buy the land, stating that she thought she could redeem it later).

[d] Where a joint administrator was a defendant to partition both as an individual and as a personal representative, and the judgment authorized any party to purchase, he could purchase in his individual capacity, without being chargeable as trustee for the plaintiff heirs, although the joint answer of the administrators asked for substantially the same relief asked in the complaint; but he could not take individual advantage of information received as administrator so as to work a fraud. La Forge v. Latourette, 129 App. Div. 447, 114 NYS 146 [aff 198 N. Y. 591 mem, 92 NE 1089 mem].

[e] Burden of proof as to fairness.—Where an administrator, who was also guardian of the infant heirs, purchased the real estate of the intestate at a sale under a decree in partition, the burden of proof was on him to show that he gave a full price; and he having sold the land six years afterward at a great advance was compelled to account for the advanced price. decedent was partitioned among his heirs by the probate court, that set apart to one of the heirs ceased to be the property of the estate, the administrator ceased to have any control thereover, and was not bound to pay the taxes thereon, or do anything to protect the rights of the heir, even though the administration had not been closed; and hence he could purchase the property at a tax sale thereof.[40]

[§ 706] b. In His Representative Capacity—(1) In General. An executor or administrator has as a rule no power to buy land with personalty of the estate, unless authorized to do so by the will or by statute;[41] but if he so purchases the property purchased will be considered in equity as part of the estate and as impressed with the character of the purchase money, and an equitable lien of creditors of decedent is sometimes favorably regarded in such a connection.[42] Where a decedent at the time of his death had an inchoate right in land under a contract of purchase or otherwise, the personal representative may complete the purchase and take a deed to himself in his representative capacity in trust for the persons interested in the estate,[43] and, even though the representative completes the purchase in his own name, the purchase may be held to be made for the benefit of the estate where it sufficiently appears from the evidence that this was the intention of the representative.[44] Where executors have a discretion in regard to investment in real property, or where there is a necessity of receiving real estate in payment of a debt, the beneficiaries are bound to accept the property thus acquired.[45] The regularity of proceedings in the probate court under which an administrator was authorized to purchase land in controversy is not subject to collateral attack in an action of trespass to try title by such administrator.[46] Where title is taken in the name of coexecutors, they hold as joint tenants with the right of survivorship and not as tenants in common.[47]

[§ 707] (2) Purchase at Judicial or Execution Sale. The general rule is that when it is for the interest of the estate that he should do so, the executor or administrator is justified in purchasing land for the estate at a foreclosure sale under a mortgage belonging to the estate,[48] or an execution sale under a judgment in his favor on some debt due decedent.[49] In such a case the representative may take a deed in his own name and by a deed executed in his own name give a good title to others which the beneficiaries of the estate cannot dispute;[50] but the purchase is presumed to be intended for the benefit of the estate, and requires him to account and turn over the property or its proceeds to the parties who would have been entitled to the mortgage or judgment debt if paid, the premises in his hands taking that character accordingly; and while he is chargeable with rents and profits later received or justly accruing, he should be reimbursed for his reasonable outlays and for such sum as he actually paid in the purchase.[51] Where an executor, in satisfaction of mortgage debts, accepted conveyances of the encumbered land and also foreclosed mortgages, and, on the sale, took deeds therefor to himself as executor, it was held that he must, as a condition precedent to his discharge and the liberation of his bondsmen, convey the premises to the Surginer v. Paddock, 31 Ark. 528.

[c] Requiring executor to convey.—Where an executor bid in, in his own name, land on which the estate had a mortgage, had the certificate of sale issued to him personally, and

[§ 708] (3) Property Taken in Payment of Debts. Where land is taken by the executor or administrator in payment of a debt due the estate, the land becomes assets in his hands and not property held in his individual right, and it should by way of substitution be subjected by him to the payment of debts and legacies, and to distribution, like personalty.[53]

The heirs cannot disaffirm the purchase of a debtor's realty if the representative acted prudently and for the good of the estate, especially if they delay unduly to proceed in the matter.[54]

[§ 709] (4) Sale or Mortgage of Property Acquired. It has been asserted that a representative, unless, of course, he has a power of sale under the will, cannot sell, without an order of court, realty acquired by him in his representative capacity;[55] but the weight of authority is in support of the representative's power to sell such realty in his discretion without any order of court,[56] and a power to mortgage property so acquired has also been asserted.[57] Under such circumstances the purchaser is not required to see to the application of the purchase money;[58] but the representative is chargeable therewith, and should appropriate it duly and account for it.[59] A sale by an executor of such property may be set aside when tainted with fraud in which the purchaser participated.[60]

Exchange. Executors who hold realty by virtue of the foreclosure of a mortgage in favor of the estate are not entitled to exchange it for other realty, and, unless the persons entitled to share in that part of the estate consent to or ratify the trade, the executors are liable to account for the value of the realty conveyed to them.[61]

[§ 710] P. Personal Property—1. Title and Authority—a. In General. The common-law rule, which is still the general rule on the subject, is that the title to personal property of a decedent, testate or intestate, vests in the personal representative until administration is completed and the estate fully settled or distributed, or until he chooses or becomes forced to part with it earlier;[62] and the rule applies

"All the personal property of a testator vests in his executor by the probate of the will." Lathrop v. Merrill, 207 Mass. 6, 10, 92 NE 1019.

"No principle of law is more generally acknowledged, than that the executor or administrator is, for every purpose, the owner of the moneys of his intestate which have come to his hands." Lacompte v. Seargent, 7 Mo. 351, 352.

He "holds it in trust for heirs and legatees, and that he alone can sue for and recover the assets of such deceased person." Richardson v. Cole, 160 Mo. 372, 376, 61 SW 182, 83 AmSR 479.

"The personal property of a decedent, not disposed of by his will, 'descends to and is distributed among his heirs, in the same way and manner that real estate. not divided, [devised] descends' by the statute, (Hutch. Dig. 624, § 52,) subject, however, to the rights of the administrator. But his title exists only for special purposes; for the collection and preservation of the assets; for the payment of the debts, and for distribution. These duties require that the executor or administrator should be invested with the title requisite to their performance. Hence, notwithstanding the peculiar phraseology of the statute, it has always been held that he acquired, by the grant of administration, the legal title to the personalty; and, consequently, that distribution, or some equivalent act, is necessary to confer upon the distributees a complete and perfect title to the personal estate of the deceased." Andrews v. Brumfield, 32 Miss. 107, 112.

[a] Where property is willed to executors to convert into a fund, and keep and distribute, etc., the title remains in them until it is actually distributed; and where a discretion is to be exercised before distribution the ultimate distributee has no vested interest in the property until such discretion has been exercised. In re Jones, 13 F. Cas. No. 7,444, 6 Biss. 68.

[b] A testator who specifically devises real estate only, leaving personalty undisposed of, and who appoints an executor, shows an intention that the executor shall administer the personalty; otherwise, he would have nothing to do. Matter of Maccaffil, 57 Misc. 264, 107 NYS 1115 [aff 127 App. Div. 21, 111 NYS 315].

[c] Where a buyer dies his administrator may take possession of the goods as his successor, and where he does so and puts an end to the right of stoppage of the seller before it is attempted to be exercised, the title to the goods vests in the estate, and cannot be defeated by the seller in an action of replevin. Jacobs v. Bentley, 86 Ark. 186, 110 SW 594, 126 AmSR 1086.

[d] Extent of title and authority.—"At common law, an executor or administrator had the same property in, and, of course, the same powers over, the personal effects or estate of his decedent, that such decedent had at and before his death." Weyer v. Franklin Second Nat. Bank, 57 Ind. 198, 203 [quot Rogers v. Zook, 86 Ind. 237, 241].

[e] Transportation of property to another state.—The title vested in an administrator appointed by the court of the decedent's domicil is not divested by the transportation of the property to another state for sale. Crescent City Ice Co. v. Stafford, 6 F. Cas. No. 3,387, 3 Woods 94.

[f] Testator's widow is not entitled to interest on or increase of testator's personal property pending administration. Harding v. Harding, 151 Ky. 398, 152 SW 259.

[g] Lien of factor.—If a person die in possession of goods, and they come into the hands of his administrator, the title is changed; and a factor who may afterward receive the goods from an administrator cannot hold them or their proceeds, on account of advances made to deceased in his lifetime, without the assent of the administrator. Swilley v. Lyon, 18 Ala. 552.

[a] The legal title to a note remains in the administrator of the payee, although in a division of the personal property, made before his appointment, it fell to one whose agent had demanded payment of the maker, and had agreed to accept interest at a certain rate for an unlimited length of time. erty specifically bequeathed vests in him subject to distribution, as in cases of intestacy.[65]

Where executors are also appointed trustees, their title to the testator's personalty as executors is superior to and takes precedence over their title as trustees.[66]

The general rule is modified by statute in a few jurisdictions so that the title to personal, as well as real, property vests in the heirs or the beneficiaries under the will, subject to the lien of the executor and administrator for the payment of debts and to his right of possession.[67]

[§ 711] b. Nature of Title. The representative, as such, takes no beneficial interest in the personalty, but takes it only for the purpose of administration and distribution to those entitled,[68] and as to the surplus remaining after the payment of debts he is a mere trustee for those beneficially

"Strictly speaking, perhaps, the legal title, even to the personal property of the decedent, does not vest in the executor or administrator under our system. But a special property in the real and personal estate vests in him, charged with the trust, not only to apply it to the payment of claims presented, but, from the nature of the trust and his representative capacity, to do such acts in carrying out contracts of deceased as the law imposes upon him the obligation of performing." "The mere legal title passes to the administrator; the equitable descends to the heirs or legatees who are entitled to distribution." Richardson v. Cole, 160 Mo. 372, 376, 61 SW 182, 83 AmSR 479. To same effect Foote v. Foote, 61 Mich. 181, 28 NW 90.

"The rule that personalty descends to the administrator is but a fiction of law invented for convenience and the benefit of creditors. His title is not absolute, it is a qualified one. He holds as trustee merely for creditors and distributees. And when the debts of the estate are paid, the residue by law descends to the heir at law. The heir at all times has an equity in such property subject to the trust title of the administrator." Byers v. Weeks, 105 Mo. A. 72, 77, 79 SW 485.

"It is true, that at common law the legal property in the personal estate of the testator vests, on his death, in the executor, and for many purposes may be regarded as the owner. He may, for instance, maintain an action for a wrongful conversion of the property, or for any injury to the property, in his individual name, and for every purpose necessary to enable him to discharge the duties of his office he is regarded in law as the owner of the property. As a necessary incident to the nature of the office, he has a disposing power over the property; but that he is the owner for every purpose, cannot be maintained upon either reason or authority." Lessing v. Vertrees, 32 Mo. 431, 434.

[a] Rights of creditors of representative.—The effects of the decedent cannot be seized by a judgment creditor of the administrator in payment of the debt of such administrator; nor are the makers of a note given to the administrator for goods of the decedent sold by him liable as garnishees to a judgment creditor, as being debtors of such administrator. Lessing v. Vertrees, 32 Mo. 431.

[b] Where the representative charges himself with the value of goods in his administration account, this is not a conversion of the goods such as will render them subject to entitled.[69] Accordingly where the personal property left by the intestate is disposed of by the sole heir and distributee, and there are no debts to be proved against the estate, an administrator subsequently appointed on the petition of such sole distributee cannot recover the property so disposed of;[70] and where a testatrix bequeathed all of her personal estate to testamentary trustees to hold, invest, and reinvest the principal, and to receive, hold, and disburse the income for the purposes mentioned in the will, and no special power or authority was given to the executor, it was held that the title to the property bequeathed to the trustees, it not being necessary to pay debts, vested in them immediately on testatrix's death, the executor being authorized only to possess himself of such property and deliver it to the trustees.[71]

The representative cannot acquire absolute title to the property by merely paying the debts or discharging the obligations of the estate,[72] except by virtue of statutes which relieve an executor who is also residuary legatee from the necessity of returning an inventory on his giving bond to pay all the debts and legacies, under which statutes it is held that the executor, on giving such bond, becomes immediately the absolute owner of the estate in his own right.[73]

[§ 712] c. When Title Vests; Relation Back. It is usually considered that the title of the executor, being derived from the will, vests at the moment of decedent's death,[74] while the title of an administrator, being based upon the ground of administration, vests when his letters are granted.[75] However, in any event, the title of the representative relates back to the death of decedent,[76] although it does not render the intervening possession of the heirs wrongful.[77]

[§ 713] 2. Possession and Use. The right to the possession and use of the personal estate of a decedent, whether testate or intestate, vests at once in the personal representative,[78] to the exclusion of execution for his debts. Robinson v. Burton, 2 Del. Ch. 814.

[c] An executor is not a mere stakeholder of the assets, but, with respect thereto, he is a trustee, with a legal title, with power to dispose of the personal effects. Leake v. Leake, 75 Va. 792.

[d] An executor cannot deny the title of his testator to property of which he is in possession as executor. Manigault v. Holmes, 8 S. C. Eq. 283.

[a] An executor has an absolute control over all the personal effects of his testator. Bailey v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 110 Me. 348, 86 A 328.

[b] An administrator of an escheated estate is the proper custodian of the personalty belonging to it, and he cannot be compelled to turn it over to a receiver appointed to take charge of the estate, because such receiver is entitled to the custody of the real estate only. Terr. v. Forrest, 1 Ariz. 49, 25 P 527.

[c] Family furniture.—Where no provision is made by will or statute for maintaining and keeping the family in possession of the family furniture or disposing of such property, and the same may be needful for sale or settlement of the estate, the representative may assume its virtual possession and control and the family can assert no title against him. Graydon v. Graydon, 23 N. J. Eq. 229 [rev on other grounds 25 N. J. Eq. 561]; Moseley's Est., 12 Phila. (Pa.) 50.

[d] Notes.—Where a wife, holding certain notes against her husband, bequeathed to him the interest on the notes for life, they were not collectable by her executor during the husband's life, but the executor was entitled to the possession and control thereof for that period. Church v. Church, 80 Vt. 228, 67 A 549.

[e] Agreement of beneficiaries to dispense with administration.—An administrator duly appointed without appeal is entitled to the possession of the uncollected choses in action belonging to the estate in the hands of the widow's administrator, although the heirs and the widow had agreed that there should be no administration. Ormsbee v. Piper, 123 Mich. 265, 82 NW 36.

[f] A legacy for life, as a general rule, should be invested by the executor, but this depends upon the terms of the will, and even though the will does not relieve the executor from the necessity of making the investment, whether he shall retain the securities or deliver them to the legatee depends upon the provisions of the will or in some cases upon the orders of the court. Foley v. Syet, 121 Md. 79, 88 A 38.

[g] Marriage of administratrix.—While the marriage of an administratrix extinguishes her authority as such (see supra § 263), it does not follow that she has not the right to retain possession of the property of the estate until the appointment of her successor, or until otherwise ordered by the court. [j] Pending appeal from order refusing to revoke letters.—A decree for the payment to an administrator of money belonging to the estate will not be denied on the ground that an appeal has been taken from the overruling of a motion for the revocation of his letters. Melanpy v. O'Bryonville Bldg., etc., Co., 13 OhS&CP 192.

[k] When administrator cannot recover possession.—Where the personal property left by the intestate is disposed of by the sole heir and distributee, and there are no debts to be proved against the estate, an administrator subsequently appointed on the petition of such sole distributee cannot recover the property so disposed of. Cooper v. Hayward, 71 Minn. 374, 74 NW 152, 70 AmSR 330.

[l] Possession not as administrator.—A person about to be appointed public administrator of the estate of an intestate who consents to receive manual possession of securities formerly belonging to his intestate, under an agreement to return the same on demand to one claiming title by reason of a gift from intestate in her lifetime, is not in legal possession of such securities as such administrator, although he retains such possession after being appointed such. Palmer v. O'Rourke, 130 Wis. 507, 110 NW 389. (2) Where the next of kin of a decedent took possession of his estate and divided it out among themselves, and sold some of it, equity could not protect them by restraining an administrator, regularly appointed, from recovering the property in actions at law. Carter v. Greenwood, 58 N. C. 410.

[c] Right as between executor and guardian of legatee.—Where a testator bequeathed certain slaves to a certain person, "should she attain the age of eighteen years," making other disposition of them if she should die before attaining that age, and gave the income to support the legatee and another person, the executor and not the guardian of the legatee was entitled to the possession of the slaves while she was under eighteen. sion of personal property, not wholly wrongful, by a decedent at the time of his death under a claim of title devolves upon his executor or administrator the immediate right of possession,[85] and the latter may recover the possession in an action of trover against any one who may have dispossessed or withheld possession from him;[86] but trover will not lie by an administrator to recover a chattel which, although inventoried and appraised as the property of decedent, is claimed adversely, and has never been in the administrator's possession.[87]

[§ 714] 3. Rights of Action. Choses in action pass to the personal representative,[88] who is also invested with the general rights of action pertaining to personal property.[89] It follows that, in the absence of some default, fraud, or refusal to act on the part of the personal representative, an heir cannot sue on rights of action belonging to the estate.[90]

[§ 715] 4. Pledged or Mortgaged Property. It is the duty of the personal representative in the exercise of good faith and ordinary or reasonable prudence to employ funds of the estate in redeeming from pledge or chattel mortgage whatever personalty of the estate may have been placed in security, which is worth redeeming by reason of a greater value than the secured indebtedness;[91] and contracts of pledge or mortgage which bound decedent will also bind his executor or administrator to the extent of available assets in his hands,[92] and

[b] Property left in possession of the residuary legatee on his promise to pay specific legacies may be recovered by the executor if the residuary legatee fails to pay the legacies. Carlisle v. Burley, 3 Me. 250.

[c] Recovery of damages.—An administrator is entitled to recover for the estate damages for being deprived of the use and possession of a chattel after the issuance of letters of administration, but he cannot recover damages for the seizure or detention of the chattels during decedent's lifetime, or prior to the issuance of letters of administration, unless it is shown that the chattel was damaged, or the estate depreciated, by the seizure or detention during that period. Day v. Horton, 23 Man. 623.

[d] Property exempt from administration.—Where the personal property did not exceed three hundred dollars in value, and therefore passed to the widow and minor children exempt from administration, the administrator cannot sue for possession of a part of such property from a third person. [b] Redemption before presentation of claim.—An administrator may redeem pledged property of the estate without waiting for a claim to be presented, provided he is willing to take the risk that the debt will not exceed the value of the property pledged. In re Eidenmuller, Myr. Prob. (Cal.) 87.

[d] Where the estate is insolvent (1) the executor may pay a chattel mortgage executed by the testator if this is necessary to save the property from foreclosure. Matter of Van Houten, 18 Misc. 524, 42 NYS 1115 [rev on other grounds 18 App. Div. 301, 46 NYS 190]. (2) But he cannot do so where the lien of the mortgage has expired by failure of the mortgagee to renew it, since the mortgagee is in such case entitled only to be paid pro rata with the general creditors. [a] Possession of pledged property.—A pledgee of certificates of stock is entitled to hold them as against an administrator of the the pledgee's or mortgagee's rights on default must be respected by him.[93] It is not, however, the duty of an executor or administrator to pledge his own property or use his own credit in order to borrow money to redeem pledged property of the estate.[94] A person who, before the granting of letters of administration, sells any of the property of a decedent covered by a chattel mortgage, is sometimes made, by statute, chargeable therewith and liable to an action by the administrator for double the value of the property so sold or alienated.[95]

[§ 716] 5. Sale—a. Power to Sell and Transfer Title—(1) Personalty in General—(a) At Common Law—aa. In General. Under the common-law rule, and in the absence of any statute providing otherwise, an executor or administrator has the absolute power to sell or dispose of the personal assets of the estate as he sees fit and can pass good title to a purchaser;[96] and the courts of one state will presume that the common-law rule prevails in pledgor, and is entitled to receive and enforce dividends or other benefits attaching thereto so long as his claim is unsatisfied, and a statute providing that the administrator shall have the right to the possession of the estate as it existed at the death of intestate does not authorize him to recover possession of such property. Fulton v. Denison Nat. Bank, 26 Tex. Civ. A. 115, 62 SW 84.

[b] A pledgee of certificates of stock is entitled to hold them as against an administrator of the pledgor, and is entitled to receive and enforce dividends or other benefits attaching thereto so long as his claim is unsatisfied. Fulton v. Denison Nat. Bank, 26 Tex. Civ. A. 115, 62 SW 84.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) A provision in a chattel mortgage that on default in the payment of the debt secured the mortgagee may take possession of the property is operative against the executor of the mortgagor, who is personally liable for a refusal to yield possession, although he was about to sell the property under an order of court. Mathew v. Mathew, 138 Cal. 334, 71 P 344. (2) The public administrator of the city of New York is liable personally for the taking or detention of personal property from the possession of a mortgagee of the property, where the mortgagee had obtained possession of the property on default in payment of his mortgage during the lifetime of the mortgagor, although the public administrator acted in his official capacity and in good faith, and in the belief that the property belonged to the mortgagor at the time of his death. Levin v. Russell, 42 N. Y. 251.

[b] Executors should not be surcharged with the difference between what stocks were sold for and their present value, where the stocks had been pledged as collateral by a firm of which testator was a member, and they were sold for payment of the debt by the survivor, pursuant to an agreement between the partners that if either of them died the survivor should regulate the sale at his discretion. "The administrator does not need the help of the court of equity to sell personal property when a sale is necessary for the payment of the debts." Hessig v. Hessig, 131 Ky. 514, 526, 115 SW 748. To same ef-

another state in the absence of any showing that it has been changed by statute.[97] Accordingly it has been held that an executor or administrator may sell equitable as well as legal assets,[98] property which is specifically bequeathed,[99] a residue of personal property given for life with remainder over,[1] patent rights,[2] a claim for services rendered by decedent,[3] land certificates which have not been located,[4] a mining contract not for a term certain,[5] and the interest of decedent in pledged property.[6] But fixtures cannot be separated from real estate and sold as personal property,[7] nor is a reversionary interest in chattels the subject of sale by an executor or administrator,[8] and it has been held that, where it does not appear that the sale is necessary for the payment of debts or legacies, and is not made so by the terms of the will, the beneficiaries may elect to take the property in specie.[9]

[§ 717] bb. Power Can Be Exercised Only While in Office. The authority to sell can be exercised only while the personal representative is in office, because his title to the assets is divested as soon as he ceases to be executor or administrator,[10] but a sale while in office is not invalidated by the subsequent removal, resignation, or discharge of the representative.[11] Where a person named as executor did not qualify by giving bond as required by statute, a sale by him is void as against an executor who did qualify.[12]

[§ 718] cc. Sale in Satisfaction of Debts of Representative. It was formerly the rule at law that executors and administrators could make a valid sale of the personal property of decedent in satisfaction of their individual debts,[13] but the rule in equity, which now obtains both in England and in the United States, is that they cannot sell in payment of their individual debts[14] unless they are in fect McLain v. Pate, 58 Tex. Civ. A. 500, 124 SW 718.

[a] "This general power of sale and disposition flows from the nature of the interest which executors and administrators are said to have in the personal property of their testators and intestates. In quality their interest is not the absolute, proper, and general interest which every person has in his own goods, for they are seized in right of another merely, and as ministers or dispensers of the goods of the dead. But in quantity their interest is coextensive with that of the persons whom they represent. As an incident to such ownership they have, subject to the limitations above stated, the same absolute power of disposal and control." Williams v. Ely, 13 Wis. 1, 7.

[b] The principle (1) on which the power of disposal rests is that in many cases it is necessary for the executor or administrator to sell in order to perform the duties of his office, and no one would buy from him if liable afterward to be called to account. Whale v. Booth, 4 T. R. 625 note a, 100 Reprint 1211. (2) "It is of great consequence that no rules should be laid down here, which may impede executors in their administration, or render their disposition of the testator's effects unsafe, or uncertain to the purchaser." Scott v. Tyler, Dick. 712, 725, 21 Reprint 448. (3) "An executor or administrator is, in equity, regarded as a trustee; but then, in equity, as well as at law, an administrator is considered, in general, as the absolute owner of the assets of the deceased, whether they be legal or equitable, or choses in action. The exercise of the powers of unqualified ownership to a certain extent is indispensably necessary to enable him to execute his trust, and to discharge his duty to advantage, and also to prevent the general inconvenience of implicating and entangling third persons in inquiries as to the application he may propose to make of the money produced by the conversion of the assets. A fair purchaser for a valuable consideration is in no way bound to see to the application of the purchase money by an executor. He cannot have the means of knowing the debts of the deceased, and is, therefore, absolved from all inquiry respecting them. Upon these general principles, not even a creditor of the deceased is permitted to follow the assets so aliened; for the demand of a creditor is only a personal demand against the executor in respect of the assets come to his hands, but no lien on the assets. And a specific or residuary legatee can stand upon no higher ground, in this respect, than a creditor." Salmon v. Clagett, 3 Bland (Md.) 125, 169.

[c] A sale for payment of debts may be made by an executor although the testator has by his will provided a fund for that purpose. Tyrrell v. Morris, 21 N. C. 559.

"Our statute has changed the common law, and requires the executor or administrator to apply to the ordinary for leave to sell (which application in the case of personal property shall be made at least ten days before the order is granted), and that advertisement be made of the day and time of sale. The intention of the law of this State seems to be that all sales of the property of decedents shall be public, after full notice to all parties interested therein." Poullain v. Brown, 82 Ga. 412, 423, 9 SE 1131 [quot Whitehurst v. Mason, 140 Ga. 148, 150, 78 SE 938].

[a] Necessity of following order of court.—Where the administrator seeks the authority of the court and obtains it, he must be held bound to pursue the authority granted to entitle him to protection from liability. Morton v. Johnston, 124 Mich. 561, 83 NW 369.

[b] Dividend paying securities.—A statute providing that no administrator or executor shall sell any dividend paying securities which the decedent owned at his death until so ordered by the court, applies only to stocks that were actually paying dividends, and not to stocks which "may" at some time pay dividends, and by necessary implication authorizes an executor or administrator to sell nondividend paying stocks as personal property. Chappell v. Chappell, 124 Ky. 691, 99 SW 959, 30 KyL 935.

[c] Private sale.—Under a statute empowering an administrator to sell personal property necessary to pay debts or legacies without an order of court at public sale, an administrator has no power in any case to sell personal property at private sale, except on an order of a probate court directing a private sale and prescribing the terms thereof. Orchard v. Wright-Dalton-Bell-Anchor Store Co., 225 Mo. 414, 125 SW 486, 20 AnnCas 1072. To same effect State v. Dickson, 213 Mo. 66, 111 SW 817.

[f] Assignment not within statute.—Where administrators paid fees to the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco for filing inventories and appraisements as required by an unconstitutional statute, it would be presumed that the probate court refused to give them credit for such payments in their accounts, and that they were chargeable to them individually, and hence being recoverable in their individual capacities, they were authorized to assign their claims without an order of court, such assignments not being within the statute providing that no sale of any property of an estate shall be valid unless made under order of the superior court. out an order of court is absolutely void and passes no title to the purchaser.[18]

[§ 720] (c) Effect of Testamentary Provisions. A power of sale may be conferred on an executor by the will, in which event he acts in making the sale by virtue of the power so conferred, and not by virtue of his common-law power or pursuant to any authority derived from the probate court.[19] As a general rule statutes requiring an order of court to authorize a sale of personalty do not apply in cases where the testator has by his will expressly authorized the executor to sell,[20] although it has been held that if the testator desires the power to be exercised without such order it should be so expressed in the will and otherwise an order is necessary.[21]

Restrictions may also be imposed by the will on the executor with reference to the sale of the testator's personalty,[22] although an executor may sometimes be justified in selling, notwithstanding the sale is in opposition to a direction of the will.[23]

[§ 721] (2) Perishable Property and Annual Crops. Although the law may require the representative to obtain authority from the court to sell the personalty, yet if he is unable to obtain the order from the court in time to prevent loss and he makes a sale, the maxim, Lex non cogit ad impossibilia, is applicable,[24] and annual crops are sometimes expressly excepted from the operation of a statute requiring an order of court to authorize a sale.[25] The administrator has authority to sell sufficient of the annual crops to reimburse one who has made advances to him to aid in putting in the crops on the estate.[26] As a general rule when perishable property is given by a will to one for life with remainder to another, it is the duty of the executor to sell the property and invest the fund, only the interest on which would belong to the person having the life estate;[27] but if the will indicates an intention that the life tenant shall enjoy the property in specie, it should not be sold.[28]

[§ 722] (3) Choses in Action—(a) In General. The common-law rule is that an executor or administrator may transfer choses in action of the estate as fully as if he was the absolute owner thereof,[29]

The will also provided that, if the income derived from certain property held in trust for his wife should be less than the amount which the will provided should be paid to the wife, the income and dividends arising from the stock of such corporation held by his executors in trust should be used in making up such deficiency. It was held that the executors were not authorized to sell the stock unless the widow married again, in which case her income was to cease, or unless she died. Lembeck v. Lembeck, 73 N. J. and, although ordinarily choses in action should be collected, rather than sold, circumstances may render a sale, even at a discount, beneficial to the estate; and of the existence of such circumstances the executor or administrator is to judge in the exercise of the discretion committed to him.[30]

A claim which is essentially for the benefit of another may be assigned by the administrator to such other person, since the only interest of the estate is to see it paid to such person.[31]

Transfers in satisfaction of the decedent's debts may be made by an executor or administrator,[32] but the personal representative has no right to make such a transfer to the prejudice of other creditors of the estate,[33] although it will be sustained as between himself and the transferee.[34]

A transfer in satisfaction of an individual debt of the representative is unauthorized.[35]

Statutes requiring sales of personalty to be under order of court have been held in some cases to apply only to tangible personalty, and not to affect the representative's power to dispose of choses in action,[36] but the more generally accepted view is that such statutes are not so restricted but apply to choses in action as well as tangible personalty.[37]

[§ 723] (b) Foreign Debts. While the more generally accepted view is that an executor or administrator may assign a claim against a nonresident of the state in which he was appointed and is acting so as to authorize the assignee to sue the debtor in the courts of the latter's domicile,[38] the right of the representative to make such an as-

Brand v. Smith, 99 Mich. 395, 58 NW 363.

[c] Contracts relating to land.— A contract for the construction of a railroad provided that the contractor should receive a conveyance of thirty sections of land on completion of each ten miles of road. On the death of the contractor before completing the construction of the road, it was held that his rights under the contract as to the uncompleted portion constituted a chose in action which his administrator could assign, but that as to the completed portion his right to a conveyance was real estate which the administrator could not sell except under an order of court as for a sale of lands. "It is true, bonds, notes, bills, and accounts are not ordinarily sold, and in most cases ought not to be. They are regarded as personal property, in a sort of intermediate condition between goods and chattels and money, the standard of value; as it were, the former in process of reduction to the latter. Hence the interests of the estate are generally promoted by the collection, rather than the sale, of such property. But nevertheless they are personal property, and, as such, subject to sale." Lappin v. Mumford, supra.

[a] Sale at discount.—Where an administrator had sold real estate on credit more advantageously than it could have been sold for cash, and was subsequently pressed for money, he was justified in selling at a discount some of the securities taken for the price, the interest of the estate being thereby promoted. signment has been denied, apparently on the view that to give effect to such assignment would extend the representative's authority beyond the state in which he was appointed, and amount to an administration in another state, to the possible detriment of resident creditors.[39]

[§ 724] (c) Cause of Action for Death. The administrator of a decedent who left a widow and infant children may not without consideration assign to the widow a cause of action for decedent's death.[40]

[§ 725] (d) Commercial Paper. According to the common-law rule it is within the power of an executor or administrator to indorse over and transfer commercial paper payable to his decedent,[41] and it necessarily follows from this that he may transfer such paper when it is payable to himself in his representative capacity.[42] In some jurisdictions the representative is held to have power to transfer negotiable paper without an order of court authorizing him to do so, although the statute requires an order of court to authorize the transfer of personalty, it being considered that such statutes do not apply to negotiable instruments,[43] but in other jurisdictions such statutes are held to include negotiable instruments.[44] In some jurisdictions the power of the executor or administrator to transfer notes is limited to certain specific cases.[45] In those states where the administrator has power to indorse and assign notes due decedent it will be presumed that an administrator in another state has the same power,[46] unless it is alleged or shown that the administrator's power is regulated or restricted by statute of that state,[47] while in a state where the

[a] Reason for rule.—"The title to a negotiable instrument passes by indorsement, and if indorsed by an administrator, who is the representative of the deceased owner, in the proper settlement of an estate and without affecting the rights of other parties, why should its effect be limited to the boundaries of the state where the deceased lived? Not only would this limit the negotiability of the instrument, but it would cast upon an administrator the unnecessary burden of procuring letters of administration in another state simply to collect an admitted debt. Moreover, suppose the administrator, indorsee, and maker lived in the same state at the time of the indorsement, but that the maker subsequently removed to another state; could it be claimed that the indorsee would be barred from suing in the second state because his title came through an administrator who would himself be incapable of bringing suit in that state? Yet the elements of title, in the case supposed, would be the same as in the case in question. We see no reason why the residence of the maker should affect or control the plaintiff's title or his right to sue. The right of action is transitory; the holder of a note must collect of the maker where he can find him. If, therefore, as against the maker, the holder's title to a note is good, his right of action should be good also. We therefore hold that, in a case like this, in which no interests but those of the parties to the note are involved—and we say this without passing upon the effect of a transfer when there are creditors in this state—an administrator in another state may transfer a note upon which the indorsee may sue in this state." administrator must be authorized by order of court before he can assign a note, it has been presumed that the law of a foreign country is the same.[48]

[§ 726] (e) Effect of Assignment. An authorized assignment of a claim by the executor or administrator of the claimant enables the assignee to sue on the claim anywhere.[49] Where an administratrix was fraudulently induced to assign a policy on her intestate's life, and the assignee transferred it to another with knowledge of the fraud, but who did not know that the transfer was made without an order of court, the ultimate transferee did not acquire title to the property.[50]

[§ 727] (4) Stocks and Bonds. At common law the executor or administrator has power to transfer stocks and bonds which belonged to his decedent at the time of his death,[51] but the statutes sometimes prohibit the sale of property of this character without an order of court.[52] Where a transfer is to be made, it may be made in the representative's own name,[53] and such an assignment carries with it a cause of action for the conversion of stock.[54] In the absence of ancillary administration or statutory prohibition the domiciliary administrator duly appointed has authority to sell and assign the stock of decedent in a foreign corporation.[55]

[§ 728] (5) Mortgages. As a general rule the authority of the executor or administrator of a mortgagee extends to an assignment of the mortgage debt,[56] although it is sometimes required that an order of court to that effect be procured in order to warrant such an assignment.[57] An assignment by an executor of a mortgage held by his testator, and not foreclosed, is valid, although it contains a provision that upon the payment of certain other specified claims held by the assignee against a third person the mortgage shall be canceled and discharged.[58]

[§ 729] b. Duty to Sell. Executors and administrators are not required to sell nonperishable property unless the will so directs, or unless a sale is necessary to pay debts or legacies.[59] Under a statute requiring the court, on application of the executor, to direct the sale of such portion of the personal effects of a decedent as are of a perishable nature, or which from any cause would otherwise be "likely to depreciate in value," an executor is not bound, under penalty of personal liability for loss resulting from his failure so to do, to procure a sale of property such as stocks subject to fluctuations in market value and which may or may not depreciate according to such fluctuations, but is only bound to exercise reasonable business prudence in the matter.[60]

[§ 730] c. Time for Sale.[61] So far as an executor or administrator may be bound to sell and dispose of personalty, he should proceed to do so within a reasonable time,[62] and where the will gives

[a] "Each case must stand upon its own facts; that what would be a reasonable time in one instance might not be in another; and while the one year allowed to close the estate may sometimes mark the limit of discretion, and is always a circumstance to be considered, it is not necessarily conclusive. In this state, at all events, there is no arbitrary standard." Matter of Gray, 91 N. Y. 502, 510.

[b] Immediate sale.—It is much the safer rule for an administrator to convert the assets into money immediately. But this is not always practicable nor always to the best interest of the estate. In re Allam, 199 Pa. 573, 49 A 252.

[c] Hasty or improvident sale not required.—An executor or administrator is not required to sell hastily or improvidently if the situation or circumstances are of such a character as seriously to lessen the price for which the property ought to sell. Mickle v. Brown, 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 468.

[d] Perishable property ought to be sold without delay; and if the executor or administrator fails to do so, and retains it until it deteriorates in value, he is chargeable with its

the executor a discretion as to the time of sale, and he acts in good faith, he is not chargeable with loss resulting from selling at the time when he did, whether his judgment that such sale could then be made without a sacrifice was or was not reasonable.[63] An executor or administrator is not to be controlled by the directions of the next of kin,[64] nor should he attempt to sell the personalty before probate of the will and the issuance of letters testamentary.[65] The English rule, which is followed in some American cases, fixes one year from decedent's death or the granting of letters as the time within which a sale shall ordinarily be made,[66] although the sale may be deferred beyond that time where the executor or administrator acts in good faith for the benefit of the estate, and with reasonable prudence.[67] The lapse of many years since a testator's death may raise a presumption that all debts have been paid, so as to put a subsequent purchaser on inquiry,[68] but this rule has been held not applicable to leaseholds,[69] and the transfer of a land certificate by an administratrix before her discharge has been held valid without an order of court, although made eighteen years after letters were taken out.[70]

[§ 731] d. Manner and Conduct of Sale.[71] At common law the manner of sale is a matter resting in the discretion of the personal representative,[72] who may sell at either private or public sale as he may deem best;[73] but in some states the statutes require a public or auction sale unless the probate court has specially authorized a private sale.[74] It value at the time when it should have been sold. Steele v. Knox, 10 Ala. 608.

[e] Small estate owing large debts.—Where a succession was small and much in debt, it was held that the executor should sell as soon as the inventory should be made, and that he would be personally charged with any expenses resulting from the delay, if he suffered more than a year to elapse before selling. Goodbear v. Gary, 1 La. Ann. 240.

[f] Where an administrator acts with good faith, and with that degree of caution which prudent men exhibit in the conduct of their own affairs, he is to be liberally dealt with, and will not be charged with a loss resulting from his failure to make an immediate sale of personalty. Matter of Green, 37 N. J. Eq. 254; Weston v. Ward, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 415; Stewart's App., 110 Pa. 410, 6 A 321; Bosio's Est., 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 437.

[g] Delay held proper.—Decedent died in Philadelphia Dec. 20, 1826. One item of his personalty was an ostrich which he had been engaged in exhibiting. The ostrich was inventoried at three hundred dollars. The administrator sold all the other personalty at public auction, but did not put the ostrich up for sale publicly, although he attempted to dispose of it at private sale. He retained two persons (who had been employed for the same purpose by the intestate in his lifetime) to superintend the care and exhibition of the ostrich; and he exhibited it in Philadelphia, from December, 1826, until some time in the month of April, 1827, when it was removed from Philadelphia for the purpose of exhibiting it in New York. It was taken as far as Frankford, when it died and was afterward sold for forty-five dollars. It was held that the administrator was not chargeable with the value of the bird. Bosio's Est., 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 437, 439 ("But four months elapsed between the taking of the inventory and the death of the bird; those four months were the most inauspicious in the year, either for its sale or exhibition; and the property was of that peculiar kind that few customers, even under favorable circumstances, could be anticipated. To have made a public sale immediately after the intestate's death would have been the almost certain means of sacrificing the property; and its postponement was, apparently at least, for the benefit of the estate. . . . The bird was a native of the warmest regions of the globe, care and danger always accompanying the keeping of it during a bleak North American winter; and the kind of adventurous spirits who, in general, are disposed to embark in the purchase of such a curiosity, in hopes of ultimate gain from its exhibition, would, in general, be desirous of buying in the spring, when they might have the chance of one season at least of successful experiment. The loss likely to be sustained by this estate shows the folly of such a winter purchase. Testing the conduct of this administrator by the principles of good faith and the obligations of ordinary prudence, I see nothing to find fault with. From the time he took possession of the bird, he continually offered it for sale, and declined closing with offers made him, only because they were entirely inadequate. It is true that his asking price was beyond the appraisement, yet it was beneath what his intestate actually paid for the property, and it does not appear that the price demanded was a fixed and absolute limit").

[c] Liability for private sale.—An executor or administrator who sells at private sale for cash ought to be charged with such sum as the property would have sold for at public auction for cash. Hudson v. Hudson, 5 Munf. (19 Va.) 180.

[d] Sale not within statute.—A requirement that property belonging to vacant successions can only be sold at public auction after advertisement, does not apply to sales under a statutory provision, that if a succession is so small that no one will accept the curatorship, the judge, after ordering an inventory, shall appoint the district attorney curator, who shall cause the effects to be sold and the proceeds applied to payment of the debts, the whole to be done in as summary a manner as possible to diminish costs. Simmons v. Saul, 138 U. S. 439, 11 SCt 369, 34 L. ed. 1054.

[e] Sale of crops at market.—(1) An executor may sell annual crops at has been held, however, that such a statute does not control a discretion given to executors by the will with respect to the manner of sale.[75] It has been held to be a matter of indifference whether an executor or trustee observes the order of sale enjoined in the will or not, provided that no depreciation takes place in the property whose sale is irregularly postponed;[76] and a testamentary direction that certain paintings owned by the testator and of which a sale is directed "are to be taken to Europe to be recognized by art authorities" in order that the highest price be obtained for them has been held to be directory merely.[77]

[§ 732] e. By Whom Sale Made. As a general rule the sale is to be made by the executor or administrator,[78] and if the will directs that property shall be sold, without naming the person to sell, the executor is the proper person to carry out the directions.[79] While an executor cannot delegate to another the execution of a special power of sale committed to him by the will in personal trust and confidence,[80] neither an executor nor an administrator is required to act personally, but he may employ an agent or auctioneer to sell.[81] In case of such employment, however, the sale is still the representative's own act, and he is responsible for the negligence or defalcation of the agent, unless he used due and proper care in making the selection.[82]

[§ 733] f. Price. It is the duty of an executor or administrator to realize the best price obtainable for the property,[83] and if he fails in this duty he is personally liable to the persons interested in the estate for the difference between the amount received and the amount which he could have realized.[84] But if he acts in good faith and with reasonable prudence and diligence he cannot be held liable as for a devastavit upon the theory that he might have sold for a better price than he actually obtained,[85] and he is properly credited with the difference between the par value of bonds and what they brought on a sale, where it does not appear that they were sold for less than their market value.[86] It is sometimes required that the property shall not be sold for less than its appraised value,[87] but it has been held that a statute providing that unless the purchase price of property belonging to a succession is equal to its actual value its sale for less than the amount of its appraisement is void relates only to the first offering, and when the property is readvertised for sale and at a second offering sold on a twelve-months' credit it may be validly sold for whatever it will bring.[88] Where the will of a partner fixed the private sale, but they must be actually carried to market and sold there and cannot be sold at private sale on the estate. Neal v. Patten, 40 Ga. 363. (2) The crops must not be sent to a foreign market; to do this is a devastavit, for which it is no excuse that it was done to avoid seizure by the government. Poullian v. (2) A statute providing that when one dies leaving a stock of merchandise the court may allow the executor or administrator to dispose of the same at private sale, the terms being first made known to the court, is intended to confer authority to permit a private sale, upon certain terms, and this presupposes some definite offer by one proposing to buy the whole or a portion of the stock, and an order authorizing a private sale of such stock in the usual course of business is void. This was negatived by an expert picture dealer in his testimony; he was of the opinion that they could be sold as well here as in Germany").

[c] Liability for not selling on credit.—Where an executor or administrator sells at private sale for cash, he ought to be charged therefor such further sum as the property would have brought upon a reasonable credit, if the situation of the estate would admit such credit. Hudson v. Hudson, 5 Munf. (19 Va.) 180.

[d] Where the statute fixes the period of credit. a sale on a longer credit is void. Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Robbins, 128 Ind. 449, 26 NE 116, 25 AmSR 445, 12 LRA 498 (ten years' credit where statute authorized twelve months).

[a] Security is required when a sale is private as well as when it is made at public auction. Bowen v. Shay, 105 Ill. 132.

[b] Sufficiency of security. — Where an executor sold goods of testator on credit, and accepted as security a man generally reputed as good for the amount, this was sufficient to relieve him from liability, although the security did not possess a freehold. Konigmacher v. Kimmel, 1 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 207, 21 AmD 374.

[c] Taking the note of a third person indorsed by the purchaser is not a compliance with a statute requiring the representative to take a bond of the purchaser with approved security. Steger v. Bush, Sm. & M. Ch. (Miss.) 172.

[d] Failure of distributee's husband to object.—The omission of an administrator to take the security required by law on selling the property of the estate cannot be excused upon the mere ground that the distributee's husband, who may not have known what was the administrator's duty, was present and made no objection; nor is the distributee estopped from objecting to the credit. Walls v. Grigsby, 42 Ala. 473.

[e] Taking security after delivery of the property to the purchaser (1) satisfies the requirement of the law, and therefore an administrator is not chargeable as for a failure to take required security merely because he delivered the property to the purchaser and permitted him to remove it from the state before the security was given. Dean v. Rathbone, 15 Ala. 328. (2) But if he is unable to obtain the security after delivering the property to the purchaser, he becomes liable for the price. Betts v. Blackwell, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 373.

W. Va.—Wolfe v. Morgan, 61 W. Va. 287, 56 SE 504.

[a] It is gross negligence for an administrator to sell property on credit and take no security other than the bond of the purchaser. Roseman v. Pless, 65 N. C. 374.

[b] The fact that the price exceeded the value of the goods sold will not relieve the administrator from liability, if he fails to take security as required by law. Hasbrouck v. Hasbrouck, 27 N. Y. 182.

[c] The financial standing of the purchaser at the time of the sale does not affect the liability of an executor or administrator who fails to take security. Massey v. Cureton, 15 S. C. Eq. 181.

[d] Representative liable for whole of purchase money.—An administrator who sells the estate of his intestate on credit, and without security, is to be charged with the whole purchase money, and is precluded from showing that the price was too high. Hasbrouck v. Hasbrouck, 27 N. Y. 182 [rev 37 Barb. 579].

[e] Unauthorized approval of probate judge.—The administrator cannot shield himself by showing that the probate judge approved the security, in the absence of any law conferring such power on the probate judge. Sherrell v. Shepard, 19 Fla. 300.

[f] Representative chargeable with interest.—Lindley v. State, 116 Ind. 235, 18 NE 45.

[g] Delay in giving security.—The representative is not chargeable with the value of property sold by him and delivered to the purchaser before the latter has complied with the terms of sale as to security, if the purchaser afterward complies therewith. Dean v. Rathbone, 15 Ala. 328.

[h] Sale as for cash through factors; delivery before payment.—Where factors employed by an executor sold crops to a house of unsuspected credit, and did not require security because the sale was intended as a cash sale, and payment was demanded on the fourth day after the sale, and frequently thereafter, but the purchaser failed, the executor was not negligent in part-

solvency of sureties at the time they were accepted shows prima facie that the personal representative was negligent;[95] but an executor or administrator who accepts sureties who are at the time sufficient is not chargeable because of their subsequent insolvency,[96] or because an action on the note was successfully defended without fault on his part,[97] unless the sale was unauthorized and improper,[98] or the security was such as he had no right to take.[99]

Approval of security. As a general rule it is for the executor or administrator to determine the sufficiency of the security, and he is personally liable for any loss occasioned by his negligence or improper conduct in regard thereto,[1] but approval by the court is sometimes required.[2]

What security may be taken. Although as a general rule an executor or administrator relieves himself of personal liability for the price of goods of the estate sold on credit, where he takes sureties of sufficient financial ability at the time when he accepted them, he cannot relieve himself of liability by taking nonresidents of the state,[3] or a person who is the purchaser's partner in business;[4] and there is authority for the view that the personal security afforded by sureties on the note of the purchaser should not be allowed at all.[5]

Exchange of property. Where administrators, instead of selling bonds for cash, exchanged them for stock of a corporation which proves worthless, they were properly surcharged with the loss.[6]

[§ 735] h. Who May Purchase[7]—(1) In General. The general rule, subject to certain exceptions about to be discussed,[8] is that anyone may buy the property for what it will bring at a sale thereof.[9]

[§ 736] (2) Personal Representative—(a) General Rule. It is well settled as a general rule that an executor or administrator has no right, without the consent of the beneficiaries, to purchase the property at a sale thereof, either public or private, whether the sale is made by himself or by his coexecutor or coadministrator,[10] and a purchase by an executor or administrator from a third person

ing with the crop without security for the payment and hence was not chargeable with the loss. Taveau v. Ball, 6 S. C. Eq. 456.

[i] Reservation of title.—An administrator who sells chattels of the estate merely reserving title as security does so at his own peril, and is responsible for resulting loss, the statute directing that he take notes with good security for the price. Pierce v. Whipple, 123 Ark. 132, 184 SW 837.

[j] Delivery in escrow.—Where an administrator sold property and delivered it in escrow pending payment which might have been postponed for three years, there was no sale on credit for more than one year such as is prohibited by statute, but the depositary held the shares as a bailee. In re Heinze, 224 N. Y. 1, 120 NE 63 [aff 181 App. Div. 915, 167 NYS 1104].

[a] It must appear that the insolvency occurred or was discovered after the note was given, and the executor cannot discharge himself from liability for the amount of the note merely by showing that the parties thereto "proved insolvent." He must also show that they were either solvent or reputed to be solvent when the note was given. Stewart v. Stewart, 31 Ala. 207.

97. Stewart v. Stewart, 31 Ala. 207 (a successful defense to a note given for the price of property relieves the executor or administrator from liability, if it was not through his fault that the purchaser was able to defend, although the parties to the note were insolvent).

98. Smith v. Smith, 1 S. C. Eq. 304 (if the sale was unauthorized the executor is not relieved from liability by the fact that he took security and the sureties afterward became insolvent).

99. Peay v. Fleming, 11 S. C. Eq. 97 (taking security other than is authorized by the order of court is at the risk of the administrator, and he must bear any loss that ensues).

5. Matter of Woodbury, 13 Misc. 474, 35 NYS 485 (in this case the executor sold property of decedent and took the note of the purchaser with an indorser, after satisfying himself that the note was good and such as business men would ordinarily exact in commercial dealings. Soon afterward the maker of the note went into bankruptcy and the indorser became irresponsible. On his accounting, the executor claimed exemption from liability for the reason that the note was an "approved security" within Code Civ. Proc., § 2717, which provides for such security upon a sale by the executor or administrator of the personal property of the deceased. The court, however, held that the "approved security" required by the statute meant national and state bonds and mortgages on real estate, "because it [the sale on credit] is an investment for the time being of the assets of the estate, and courts have held rigidly to the rule that if trustees, without express authority in some legal form, invest in notes, stocks, or bonds, they will be held responsible for all losses occasioned by such investments").

Ont.—Yost v. Crombie, 8 U. C. C. P. 159.

[a] Reasons for rule.—(1) "The entire control which the administrator has over his own sale, and the great temptation to fraud, has induced the courts to decide that the price at which he may purchase shall not be regarded as conclusive of the value. It is in the nature of an offer made by him which those entitled to the amount may accept, and if they do, he is bound; but if they are able to show that the property is of greater value, he must account ac-who was an actual bidder at the sale, but who was acting in collusion with the executor or administrator, or pursuant to an agreement or understanding with him, is merely an indirect purchase by him at his own sale, and is therefore subject to the same infirmity as if he had purchased in the first instance.[11] The fact that the sale was fair and the price adequate does not, according to the weight of authority, prevent the application of the rule;[12] but there is also authority for the view that the representative may become a purchaser at his own sale, if he makes the sale fairly and pays full value.[13]

[§ 737] (b) Effect of Sale. It is usually considered that a sale by an executor or administrator to himself is not void but only voidable at the option of those interested in the estate,[14] and it is valid as to them until it is set aside at their instance,[15] and may be allowed to stand where it appears that the price was fair and that the transaction was for the benefit of the estate, and satisfactory to those beneficially interested.[16] As to cordingly." Foster v. Brown, 37 S. C. L. 254, 256. (2) "This doctrine rests on the ground, well established in equity, that no trustee or person filling a fiduciary relation shall be allowed to make a profit to himself by the purchase, sale, or use of the property so intrusted to him." Yost v. Crombie, 8 U. C. C. P. 159.

[b] Lien for price against property in the hands of subsequent purchaser.—Where an administrator becomes a purchaser at his own sale, even if the purchase is valid, the statutory lien for the price of the property still exists on the property in his hands and may be enforced against the property in the hands of his purchaser, although he paid the price to the administrator, since payment to the estate is the only thing that can discharge the lien. Baines v. McGee, 9 Miss. 208.

[c] Purchase by executor who has not qualified.—A sale is not to be avoided merely because the purchaser has the power to become executor or trustee of the property purchased, as by proving the will which relates thereto, where in point of fact he never does become such. Such a purchaser is under no disability, and in order to avoid such sale it must be shown that he in fact used his power in such a way as to render it inequitable that the sale should be upheld. Clark v. Clark, 9 App. Cas. 733.

[d] Purchase by corporation.—Where administrator disposes of property of the estate to a corporation in which he is interested, the purchase is a purchase by the administrator, and value of property and any profits by corporation accrue to estate, and administrator is accountable. Macfadden v. Jenkins, (N. D.) 169 NW 151.

[c] Sale held void.—Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. (U. S.) 503, 557, 11 L. ed. 1076 ("The purchase is void, and will be set aside at the instance of the cestui que trust, and a resale ordered, on the ground of the temptation to abuse, and of the danger of imposition inaccessible to the eye of the court. We are aware that cases may be found in the reports of some of the chancery courts in the United States, in which it has been held that an executor may purchase, if it be without fraud, any property of his testator, at open and public sale, for a fair price, and that such purchase is only voidable, and not void as we hold it to be. But with all due respect for the learned judges who have so decided, we say that an executor or administrator is, in equity, a trustee for the next of kin, legatees, and creditors, and that we have been unable to find any one well-considered decision, with other cases, or any one case in the books, to sustain the right of an executor to become the purchaser of the property which he represents, or any portion of it, though he has done so for a fair price, without fraud, at a public sale. Why should the rule be relaxed in the case of persons most frequently exposed to the temptations of self-interest, who may yield to it more readily than any others, with a larger impunity, if the day of equitable retribution shall ever come for those who have been defrauded? Is it not better that the cause of the evil shall be prohibited than that courts of equity shall be relied upon to apply the remedy in particular cases, by inquiring into all the circumstances of a case, whether there has or has not been fraud in fact?"); Macarty v. Bond, 9 La. 351 (a sale to the administrator is absolutely null, and may be attacked by an opposing creditor without alleging that it was in fraud of his rights or to his injury).

[§ 738] (c) Exceptions to Rule. The rule forbidding an executor or administrator to purchase property of the estate is not of universal application, but is subject to several exceptions.[19] Thus it has been held that he may purchase with the consent of all the persons interested in the estate,[20] or where he is himself a beneficiary of the estate,[21] or may take specific property to pay any indebtedness of the estate to himself for advances or otherwise.[22] In some jurisdictions executors and administrators have been expressly authorized by statute, subject to certain restrictions, to purchase at sales of their decedents' property.[23]

[§ 739] (d) Ratification. A sale by an executor or administrator to himself may be ratified by those interested in the estate,[24] and there is a ratification where such persons, with knowledge of the facts, acquiesce or fail to object within a reasonable time,[25] or accept a note given by the personal representative for the purchase money,[26] or where the representative accounts with them for the price, without any unfairness in the settlement and with knowledge on their part of all the facts.[27]

[§ 740] (e) Purchase from Original Purchaser. The representative may purchase from a purchaser, if the original transaction was in good faith and without collusion,[28] but the court will look with great jealousy at such a transaction, particularly where the transfer of bids or title takes place very soon after the sale.[29]

[§ 741] (f) Liability of Representative. The representative who purchases the property of the estate becomes personally liable for the price,[30] or

She has, however, delayed until probably all the stock of goods which she has received has been used, and long enough to enjoy all the chances of success in the venture, and must we think be held to have distinctly elected to be bound by the bargain. So if the testator's plate was pledged to its full value, the executors might redeem it with their own money and retain it (Woodward v. Darcy, Plowd. 184), and if they pay debts of the testator's with their own money they may retain his goods to the value as their own. The form of a sale by auction was no more than a mode of ascertaining the value of the goods which he took. And the creditor may test the matter as to whether the goods seized exceed in value the sum for which the plaintiff had a right to retain, by suggesting a devastavit, if there is not enough to satisfy his claim out of the remaining assets of the estate, which appears a more reasonable mode of proceeding than by interpleader in a case of this description." Yost v. Crombie, supra.

"As he has the right to retain property at its fair value, in payment of a debt due to himself from the estate, his purchase may be considered as an election to retain, where he has the right to retain; and on that ground his title might not be disturbed, but he would be held to account for the full value, at whatever nominal price he may have purchased." value[31] thereof, and is chargeable with the amount as cash after the expiration of the term of credit.[32] It has been held that if the representative purchases at less than the appraised value he will be accountable for the difference,[33] and also that if he purchases and resells at a profit, such profit belongs to the estate.[34] An administrator who, having taken property of the estate, crediting it therefor, is personally sued therefor by another is not entitled to a credit, on his accounting, for the amount of the judgment recovered against him.[35]

[§ 742] (3) Relative of Representative. The husband of an executrix or administratrix cannot purchase from her or from her coexecutors or coadministrators without the consent of all the beneficiaries.[36] A sale by an executor or administrator to his son has been considered improper;[37] but it has also been held that a public sale of the assets to the son of the executor was not invalid, where a proper notice was given, and the price obtained was the best price bid, and there was no pretense that the purchase in any way operated to the benefit of the executor.[38]

[§ 743] (4) Surviving Partner of Decedent.[39] A surviving partner who is disposing of the property of the partnership in the absence of an executor or administrator of the deceased partner cannot buy the partnership effects himself, for he cannot at the same time occupy the position of vendor and purchaser;[40] but the reason which would forbid a transaction of this character has no application to a case where a surviving partner purchases property from the executor or administrator of the deceased partner, and such a purchase is permissible.[41] Where the executor of the estate of a deceased partner sold to the surviving partner the interest of the estate in the business, and the same was then acquired by a firm in which such survivor and the executor, individually, had almost the entire interest, and the sale was approved by the county court in proceedings to which the legatees of the deceased partner were not parties, and they did not know of the transaction until long after the term of court had expired, a court of equity had jurisdiction to set the sale aside.[42]

[§ 744] i. Conveyance and Transfer.[43] If a sale is made under a power given by the will, and is absolute, and possession is delivered by the executor, no bill of sale or other written evidence is necessary to transfer the title to the purchaser.[44] It has been held that, where there is a written conveyance in which the executor neglects to recite his authority to convey, the conveyance will nevertheless be referred to such authority.[45] The purchaser of corporate stock at an executor's sale has the right to demand the identical shares purchased,[46] but the executor is entitled to a reasonable time after the sale in which to deliver the

[b] If the property becomes worthless in his hands, as in the case of emancipated slaves, he is liable for the value at the time of the sale. McDonald v. Jacobs, 85 Ala. 64, 4 S 605.

[c] Property fluctuating in value.—Where an executor sold to himself, at private sale, shares of stock belonging to the estate, on his accounting, the parties in interest were disposed to sanction the purchase, the executor was held liable for the market value of the stock on the day of the sale, with interest. Barker v. Smith, 1 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 290.

[d] Corporate stock.—Where an executor, being desirous of acquiring stock owned by the estate in order to secure control of the corporation, sold it under such circumstances as evidenced an intention to prevent others from bidding and obtaining it for his own benefit, and became the purchaser, and the persons interested elected to treat the transaction as a sale, the executor would be surcharged with the fair value of the stock, to be determined by evidence as to what persons were willing to pay for it, it not being generally dealt in. stock certificate.[47]

[§ 745] j. Payment or Recovery of Price.[48] The giving of a note for property purchased at an administrator's sale is not a payment therefor,[49] nor is an executor or administrator authorized to receive other property in payment for property sold by him.[50] It is presumed, after the lapse of a proper time for collecting the purchase money, that the representative has collected it.[51] Where the representative sells through an agent, partly for cash and partly on credit, and the purchasers make a cash payment to the agent, he receives it to the use of the representative.[52] Fraudulent representations in the sale may be set up by a deceived purchaser, either by action as against the representative personally or by way of defense against his own note given for the purchase money,[53] and in an action on such a note the purchaser may also show that the property for which the note was given was taken out of his possession and sold under judgments against the estate, and that the consideration of the note thus failed.[54] The purchaser upon discovering any irregularity or defect which justifies him either in rescinding the sale or in claiming damages should act promptly and so far as possible on his part seek to place the representative and estate in statu quo;[55] but where the sale is void in its inception the representative cannot coerce payment of the purchase money, and the purchaser may set up the invalidity of the contract without placing the representative in statu quo by a return of the property.[56] Where a physician and eye specialist entered into a contract with an oculist, who was administrator of the estate of a deceased physician, to purchase the business and goodwill, and the administrator, for himself, subsequently solicited the physician's as well as the oculist's business from deceased's former patients, there was a breach of the contract, precluding recovery of the portion of the price appertaining to the goodwill.[57] The purchaser may by agreement with the representative discharge his note given for the purchase money by applying the amount to the payment of the creditors of the estate,[58] but he cannot set off a debt due him from decedent against the purchase money,[59] at least where the assets are exhausted by claims having precedence in law.[60] Where an administrator takes the note of a third person, indorsed by the purchaser at the sale, and also the bond of the purchaser, and agrees to collect the note and apply the proceeds to the payment of the bond, the administrator's neglect in collecting the note, and a loss thereby, cannot relieve the purchaser from the payment of his bond, or the property from the statutory mortgage thereon.[61] Where an executor sold tobacco, made on his testator's estate, and collected a part only of the money, the residue belonged to the devisees who might pursue the debtors without recourse to the executor.[62] Where one bought property from an administrator and, through mutual mistake, paid for more articles than he received, the administrator obtained no title to the overpayment, and could convey none to the heirs.[63]

A payment in Confederate money during the Civil War might be effective,[64] and the representative has been held not chargeable with a loss resulting from his acceptance of such money in payment, where in so doing he acted in good faith and without negligence,[65] and where a sale was made with reference to Confederate money, and after the close of the war the executors settled with the purchaser at one tenth of the price bid, such settlement being

"If the administrator makes representations which he knows to be untrue, for the purpose of deceiving the purchaser, who is thereby deceived, without that degree of negligence on his part, which will throw the responsibility of the deception upon himself, we hold that he may show that fraud in defense to the note. This does not dispense with the application of the rule, caveat emptor, to such sales. I know of no case where that rule has ever been so applied as to excuse a fraud. The utmost vigilance may often be unable to guard against the practices of the fraudulent. As has been repeatedly decided by this court, in the absence of fraud, the purchaser at such sales must not only look out for the title, but for the quality of the article which he purchases. Nor can the administrator bind the estate by a warranty of either. If he assumes to do so, he would be personally responsible upon such warranty. This is carrying the doctrine of risk to the purchaser and immunity to the estate far enough. To go farther, and sanction the practice of a fraud, would tend to drive all prudent men from such sales, which would prove a serious detriment to estates." Ray v. Virgin, 12 Ill. 216, 218.

[a] False representations by auctioneer.—"The right to make such defense is not destroyed, by the mere fact that such fraud was not perpetrated by the administrator himself, but by the auctioneer employed by him to make the sale, whilst in the very act of making the sale. For it is well settled that no one can hold an interest obtained through the fraud of another, any more than if the fraud were committed by himself. In legal contemplation, it is as much against conscience to attempt to avail one's self of the iniquity of an agent, after it is known, as if there had been preconcert." Atwood v. [a] Improper receipt and retainer of Confederate money.—An administrator who during the Civil War was authorized by the probate court to sell property on credit, but sold for cash and instead of paying creditors, as he might have done, kept the Confederate money received in payment, which became valueless, is chargeable with the loss, although he acted in good faith and sold the property for a fair price. made in good faith and the amount realized being more than the value of the Confederate currency at the date of the purchase, the executors were accountable only for the amount actually received.[66]

[§ 746] k. Application of Proceeds.[67] The price of property sold, whether it is in cash or by the purchaser's note, and all other consideration or security realized, should be applied by the executor or administrator for the benefit of the estate in due course of law, and he will be held accountable accordingly;[68] but the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the proceeds nor is he responsible for any misapplication thereof,[69] unless he had at the time of payment reasonable ground for believing that the executor intended to misapply the money or was in the very transaction applying it to his own private use, in which event he is responsible to the persons injured.[70]

If an executor sells the property of another among the succession effects, the owner of such property is entitled to the proceeds of its sale, not by virtue of any privilege, but because of ownership thereof.[71]

[§ 747] 1. Validity and Effect of Sale.[72] In the absence of any showing to the contrary it is presumed that an executor or administrator who has made a sale or transfer has exercised his power rightfully;[73] and where personalty not owned by decedent but found among his chattels at the time of his death is sold the sale will usually be upheld and the right of the true owner limited to a recovery of the proceeds of sale or at most of such damages as will indemnify him.[74] A sale of property by an agent appointed by a power of attorney made by an executor, but not authorized by will to be made, is illegal as against creditors.[75] A sale of the property by a person named as executor, but who did not qualify, is void as against an executor who did qualify;[76] but where, under the existing law, an administrator has power to sell personalty, a sale by him is valid, although his letters are subsequently revoked upon the admission of a will to probate.[77] The fact that personalty belonging to an estate is traded by the executor for real estate without authority does not prevent the purchaser from getting title to the personalty which is delivered to him.[78] While a sale of personal property by an administrator without an order of court, where this is required, would be void as to distributees, if the distributees assent to it no one can complain, except perhaps creditors whose debts are unpaid or an administrator de bonis non seeking the property as assets to pay debts.[79] So also where heirs authorized and concurred in a sale of shares of stock made by the administrator, they will not be heard to say that the sale was not necessary.[80] Where an administrator acquires possession of property previously disposed of by him at a private sale, conducted in his individual capacity, he may not set up as against his purchasers the invalidity of the sale made by himself.[81] Lapse of time accompanied with proof of possession under the sale will raise a presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings[82] and cure informalities,[83] but it cannot cure a total want of authority.[84]

[§ 748] m. Ratification of Sale; Laches. An unauthorized sale of personalty may be ratified by sanction of or confirmation by the probate court,[85] or through acquiescence of the beneficiaries,[86] or the right to attack the sale may be lost through laches;[87] but the representative cannot ratify a sale made by his own agent to the prejudice of creditors of the estate and others in interest.[88] Where no order of the court was necessary to authorize an executor to sell part of corporate stock, the only asset of the estate, to raise money to save the balance of the stock from forfeiture and to pay debts, the subsequent probate of the will in effect ratified the sale.[89]

[§ 749] n. Title and Rights of Purchaser.[90] A purchaser at a sale by an executor or administrator having power to sell acquires a good title,[91] although the situation of the estate did not necessitate or warrant the sale,[92] or although the representative was committing a fraud or devastavit upon the estate,[93] unless he knew of the facts,[94] or is chargeable with constructive notice.[95] Neither does the fact that the representative misapplies the proceeds prevent a purchaser for value and in good faith from acquiring a good title.[96] The purchaser acquires no title, however, where the sale action, sold at an administrator's sale, who buys in good faith takes them discharged of all equities which attach on them merely as assets;[13] but equity will follow the property into the hands of one who is not a purchaser for value,[14] or who, although he paid a valuable consideration, has been guilty of fraud and collusion with the representative to the injury of the estate.[15] A purchaser who accepts delivery or possession on condition that he shall acquire no title until payment of the price is estopped to repudiate such condition.[16] A purchaser who has paid the purchase money, which has been applied to the payment of debts and to exonerate other property, cannot be compelled to surrender the property because of an irregularity in the appointment of the administrator without the purchase money being first refunded.[17] The estate is not liable to a purchaser on the ground that the executor induced the purchase by false representations.[18]

[§ 750] o. Setting Aside Sale[19]—(1) Grounds. Mere inadequacy of price does not invalidate a sale of personalty by an executor or administrator and is not in itself a sufficient ground for setting the sale aside,[20] but inadequacy of price coupled with other suspicious circumstances or irregularities in the sale may warrant setting the same aside.[21] Fraud or collusion between the purchaser and the representative making the sale is sufficient ground for setting the sale aside;[22] and it has been laid down that a sale regularly made at a public auction as required by law can be avoided only for such fraud or collusion.[23] But on the other hand it has been held that the fact that the purchaser has chilled the bidding at a public sale may furnish ground for setting aside the sale,[24] and an unnecessary sale at which the representative becomes the purchaser may be set aside.[25]

[§ 751] (2) Proceedings. An action to avoid a sale by an executor or administrator for his own debt may be brought by creditors, legatees, or distributees.[26] Ordinarily the personal representative cannot attack his own sale on the ground that it was made without authority,[27] but where an administratrix having made an invalid assignment of a life policy belonging to the estate placed the policy in the hands of an attorney who stated he did not see how to prevent payments by the company to the assignee, and later retired without having brought suit, whereupon the administratrix employed other counsel, her former attorney's declaration did not estop her to set aside the transfer for fraud.[28] An offer of indemnity is unnecessary where a bill in equity is filed to set aside a purchase by the representative at his own sale,[29] and in a case where certain corporate stock belonging to plaintiff had been fraudulently sold by an executor, and the purchaser had received from the corporation thereon more than the amount received by the plaintiff as the proceeds of the sale, plaintiff was not required to surrender anything as a condition to receiving a return of the stock.[30]

Parties. If the widow of an intestate is surviving she, as well as the heirs, should be made a party to an action to avoid a sale.[31]

Pleading. In a proceeding to set aside an administrator's sale of certain stock belonging to his intestate for fraud the petition must allege the facts constituting the fraud.[32]

Decree. Where a creditor of an intestate's estate sought to set aside a sale and conveyance made by the administrator for the payment of debts on the ground of fraud, the administrator not being a party to the suit, but it did not appear that the suing creditor was the only creditor of the estate, a decree directing the payment to such creditor out of the proceeds of the sale was erroneous, but the proceeds should have been put in the hands of the administrator to be applied according to law under the supervision of the probate court.[33]

[§ 752] p. Liability of Representative.[34] The usual rule requiring good faith, due diligence, and sound judgment[35] applies in cases of sales by a personal representative,[36] but where an administrator has used such a degree of intelligence as a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised, he is not personally liable for selling personal property without the authorization of an order of court.[37] Where the representative sells property of the estate, he is chargeable with the price realized,[38] especially if the sale was made without authority,[39] in which case the failure of the security taken does not relieve him from liability.[40] Even though personal property may have been sold by the representative for less than its full value, he is not chargeable with more than the price actually realized where he has been guilty of no bad faith or negligence in the transaction;[41] but he is chargeable with the actual or appraised value where he sells for less without authority[42] or in an unauthorized manner,[43] where he is guilty of improperly making or conducting a sale at which less than the true or appraised value is realized,[44] or where he has failed to keep an account of the amount actually realized.[45] Distributees, who direct an administrator to sell personal assets of the estate at a private sale without order of the probate court, are bound by his action, where he acts in good faith, and cannot hold him liable for a greater sum than he obtained on the sale,[46] nor can distributees complain of an administrator's action in selling personal assets at private sale without order of court if they suffer no damage thereby.[47] If the representative acting in good faith and without negligence takes security which is apparently good and sufficient when taken, he is not liable if it finally proves insufficient,[48] nor is he liable if otherwise a loss occurs not attributable to his fault or laches;[49] but he is liable for any loss due to his lack of diligence in collecting or realizing on

[a] Reason for rule.—"It seems to me to be settled on principle, as well as by authority, that an executor has full right to mortgage as well as to sell, and it would be very inconvenient and very disastrous if the executor were obliged immediately to convert into money by sale every part of the assets of the testator. It is a very common practice for an executor to obtain an advance from a banker for the immediate wants of the estate by depositing securities. It would be a strange thing if that could not be done. If the executor can give a preference to a creditor by paying money to him it appears impossible to say that he cannot give the preference by mortgaging the assets to him, which would be the same thing in effect as if he mortgaged to a stranger to raise the money and paid the money to the creditor." Vane v. Rigden, L. R. 5 Ch 663, 670.

[b] Equitable assets may be mortgaged. Nugent v. Gifford, 1 Atk. 463, 26 Reprint 294.

[c] Choses in action (1) belonging to a decedent's estate may be mortgaged or pledged by the executor or administrator, and a mortgage or pledge may be effected either by an actual assignment or by a deposit. Scott x. Tyler, 2 Bro. Ch. 431, 29 Reprint 241, 2 Dick. 712, 21 Reprint 448; Vane v. Rigden, L. R. 5 Ch. 663. (2) "The authorities do not prevent the pledging of choses in action to secure the debts of or to borrow money for the estate." Farmers', etc., Bank v. Sandford, 150 Ala. 195, 199, 43 S 226.

[d] The representative cannot pledge the credit of the estate generally, but only specific assets. Farhall v. Farhall, L. R. 7 Ch. 123.

[e] Contract to mortgage crops.—The administrators of an estate have not authority to enter into a contract to mortgage all the crops grown on the estate to pay a mortgage on the land given by their intestate, and future advances to be made by the mortgagee to assist in raising the crops. Jones v. Peebles, 133 Ala. 290, 32 S 60.

[f] Mortgage of leasehold to raise money for repairs.—An administrator has no power to mortgage leaseholds of the intestate in order to raise money for repairing the property, where the leases do not contain covenants requiring the lessee to repair, and such a mortgage will be set aside as against a mortgagee who has notice of the purpose for which the money was raised. Ricketts v. Lewis, 20 Ch. D. 745.

[g] A testamentary power of sale, standing alone and unaided by other provisions in the will, does not authorize a mortgage or pledge. Freeman v. Bristol Sav. Bank, 76 Conn. 212, 56 A 527.

[h] Contrary view.—Ford v. Russell, Freem. (Miss.) 42, 51 ("It is certain that the executor, as such, possesses no power to pledge the estate of his testator for the loan of money"); Boeger v. Langenberg, 42 Mo. A. 7 (except as permitted by statute); Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Weeks, 53 Vt. 115, 38 AmR 661.

55. Russell v. Plaice, 18 Beav. 21, 52 Reprint 9, 11 ("The power which the executor or administrator possesses of making a valid mortgage appears to me to include in it a power to give all that is properly incidental to that species of alienation. An executor who sells property of his testator necessarily gives the purchaser a power of selling the property bought, because such a power is incidental to and inseparable from the estate conferred upon him by the conveyance. The power of sale given to a mortgagee must, I think, be considered, not as the delegation of a power intrusted to the executor, which is a power to sell for the benefit of his cestui que trust, but as the creation of a new power to sell, not for the benefit of the persons interested in the testator's estate, but for the benefit of the person interested in the mortgage; that is, a power to render the mortgage effectual; and I think that the right to create this power is incidental to the authority of the executor to mortgage. If this were withheld, the person interested in the assets would be injured, because in that case a mortgage could not be effected, unless on terms less advantageous than could be obtained if the person advancing his money obobtained the same security as if he was dealing with the absolute owner of the estate").

[a] Debt originally contracted on personal security of executor.—It is not enough to impeach a mortgage of part of the assets that it was made to secure a debt originally contracted on the personal security of the executor, and without reference to the assets. [c] Property specifically bequeathed.—The fact that property fraudulently pledged by a coexecutor, without the knowledge of the pledgee, while the estate is in the course of administration, is specifically bequeathed to the executor as trustee does not impose a greater duty of making inquiry on the pledgee to prevent charging him with constructive notice of the fraud, and thus defeat his claim as a bona fide pledgee than if the property was a simple asset of the estate. Schell v. Deperven, 198 Pa. 600, 48 A 813, 82 AmSR 820.

[d] Individual note of executor.—Where a bank in good faith lent money to an executor on his individual note, secured by a pledge of stock belonging to the estate, and on his statement that the loan was for the purposes of the estate, the pledge was held valid, so that the stock could not be recovered without refunding the loan. Schell v. Deperven, 198 Pa. 591, 48 A 815.

[b] There must be direct evidence that the executor or administrator was acting for a purpose not connected with the administration of the estate, and such evidence is not furnished by the fact that the transaction was in the executor's individual name and that the pledgee could have ascertained by inquiring that the securities pledged were held by the executor as such. [c] A pledge of assets to secure payment of a debt of a third person is on its face an application of the assets in a manner wholly inconsistent with the duty of the executor or administrator, and the pledgee is a party to the breach of trust; and therefore the pledge will be considered at least prima facie as a fraudulent application of the assets as against all who have a claim on them, as creditors or next of kin of the decedent. [b] Pledge to secure debt of firm of which representative a member.—The fact that an executor pledged assets of the estate to secure a debt due to the pledgee by a mercantile firm, of which the executor was a member, is sufficient, in contemplation of law, to notify them that he was about to commit a devastavit, and they are charged with knowledge of all the limitations which the will as well as the law imposes on the executor. Smith v. Ayer, 101 U. S. 320, 25 L. ed. 955; Miller v. Williamson, 5 Md. 219.

[c] Property bequeathed to executor.—A mortgage given by an executor as a security for his own debt, on assets of his testator which have been absolutely bequeathed to him, is not valid, if the mortgagee has notice that debts of the testator remain unpaid. Hall v. Andrews, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195.

[d] Transaction voidable merely.—A mortgage or pledge to secure an individual debt is not absolutely void, but is only voidable at the instance of the persons interested in the estate. Boeger v. Langenberg, 42 Mo. A. 7.

"There is a broad distinction between pledging notes of the estate to secure an antecedent debt of the trustee and pledging them as security for a present or subsequent consideration. In the latter case the pledgee is not required to follow the money lent and see that it is applied to the benefit of the estate." Farmers', etc., Bank v. Sanford, supra.

[a] Circumstances imposing duty.—An executor applied to defendant for a loan, offering as security certain shares of stock belonging to the estate. The application was rejected on the ground that the executor did not have the consent of the persons who were named in the will as his coexecutors, although defendant was advised that the acting executor alone could bind the estate. The application was then abandoned. Afterward the executor's lawyer called on defendant in reference to the matter, and in the course of the conversation with defendant's officers it was suggested that if the stock were transferred to one of the members of the decedent's family, the loan could be arranged. Thereupon the stock was transferred to S, a legatee under the will, and an application was made by her for the loan with the stock as security. The loan was made accordingly, and the joint note of the executor and S was taken by defendant. S paid nothing for the stock so transferred to her. It was held that the loan was not made to the executor, but to S, and that it at once concerned defendant to see that the money was properly applied to the use of the estate; and that until that was done, defendant dealt at its own peril, because it knew from the face of the proceeding that the proper application of the proceeds of the loan, if actually intended, depended on the will and consent of S, and was not at all at the sole option of the executor. Overstreet v. Reddick, 117 Ga. 331, 43 SE 723.

[b] Assignment of mortgage.—An assignment taken by an administrator of a mortgage of his intestate is presumed to inure to the estate, and one claiming under it as inuring to the administrator individually must rebut the presumption, as by showing that the administrator purchased with his own funds, or he must show himself ignorant of any of the circumstances raising the presumption. Clapp v. Beardsley, 1 Vt. 151.

[c] Renewal of charter.—Where, upon the death of a person having a charter for a ferry, his wife, who was his administratrix and had the care of the children, although not their legal guardian, obtained a renewal of the charter in her own name, she took the charter as trusand the same is true of securities taken for debts due decedent or on a sale of decedent's assets.[65] So also property purchased by the representative with the funds of his decedent is the property of the estate held by him in trust for the heirs and distributees,[66] and whatever may have been gained or saved by an executor or administrator to the estate by way of compromise or award, and whatever profit may have accrued to the representative acting as such, belongs rightfully to the estate and should be accounted for.[67] Where the representative recovers in his own name upon a contract made with him personally after the death of his decedent, respecting the estate, or receives money for the use of the estate, he is answerable as representative for the amount.[68] It has been held that an administrator cannot buy property mortgaged by a chattel mortgage to the intestate, and bind the estate by a promise made in his capacity as administrator to pay therefor.[69]

[§ 755] b. In Individual Capacity—(1) In General. An executor or administrator cannot purchase for himself property of the estate,[70] or buy out for himself his decedent's share in a partnership,[71] and a sale indirectly made by him to a corporation in which he is largely interested is, in law, deemed fraudulent, and may be affirmed or disaffirmed at the option of the parties in interest.[72] But an executor is not guilty of any wrong where he purchases at par a note due the estate at a time when the estate is in pressing need of money, and the value of the collateral securing the note is less than the amount due thereon.[73] Where an executor without authority to carry on a business of his testator, purchases goods for that purpose, the title to such goods vests in him individually, and they are subject to an execution against him.[74] Where intestate died leaving certain real estate subject to notes for the purchase price secured by a trust deed thereon, purchase of such notes by the administrator constituted a purchase in his individual capacity, and not for the estate.[75]

[§ 756] (2) Purchase of Interest of Heir or Legatee.[76] While an executor or administrator may, if the transaction is fair and the consideration adequate, purchase the interest of a legatee or distributee,[77] such a transaction should be closely tee for the estate. Huson v. Wallace, 22 S. C. Eq. 1.

[d] Extra allowance from debtor.—If an executor or administrator receives from a debtor an allowance over and above the amount of the demand, for extra trouble in the settlement and adjustment of it, he is not bound to account for it; and if he should exact and receive extra interest he could not be charged with it in his administration account. Gordon v. West, 8 N. H. 444.

[e] Goods purchased to carry on decedent's business.—Where an executor, without authority to carry on a business of his testator, purchases goods for that purpose, the title to such goods vests in him individually. Eufaula Nat. Bank v. Manassas, 124 Ala. 379, 27 S 258.

[c] Note taken in individual name.—The court will follow a note of hand, as the property of an estate, if given for assets of the estate sold by the administrator, although taken in the individual name of the administrator, and will enjoin proceedings to enforce execution on the part of the individual creditors of the administrator. scrutinized,[78] for the relation of the parties makes such a dealing suspicious and imposes on the representative the burden of showing that no advantage has been taken by him;[79] and if the transaction is tainted with fraud or imposition it will not be allowed to stand.[80] In any event, however, where the personal representative purchases the interest of a particular heir or legatee, only the vendor can object to the transaction, and the other heirs or legatees have no right to object.[81] A presumption that the representative purchased from the legatees may arise where he retains property which belonged to the estate, claiming it as his own, for a considerable time after the close of the administration.[82] Where, after an administratrix had filed her account, she obtained from the heir an assignment of certain stocks belonging to the estate to which the heir was entitled, such transaction could not be considered as amounting to a delivery of the stocks to the heir by the administratrix and a transfer of them to her after settlement of the estate.[83] Where an administratrix obtained a voidable assignment of certain stocks belonging to the estate from the heir, she was liable, on the heir's disaffirmance, to account for the value of the stocks, dividends received thereon by her, and interest on the avails of a sale thereof from the time the stocks were sold.[84] It is not unlawful for an executor to transfer at par, in settlement of a legacy, stock which is worth less than par, and at the same time to agree to repurchase the stock later at an advanced price on his personal account.[85]

[§ 757] (3) Purchase at Judicial or Execution Sale. A personal representative is at liberty to purchase the goods of his decedent at a judicial or execution sale,[86] unless he has in some way caused the sale to be made, or is indirectly the vendor thereat.[87]

IX. ALLOWANCE TO SURVIVING SPOUSE OR CHILDREN

[§ 758] A. In General—1. Origin. At common law the maintenance and care of decedent's family form no part of the duty of an executor or administrator, and he has no right to make any expenditures out of the assets of the estate for that purpose;[88] but most of the states in the Union have provided by statute for the temporary maintenance of the widow and family of a decedent, out of his estate, until they receive their distributive shares, or until some other provision can be made for their support.[89] This allowance is of purely statutory origin,[90] no provision whatever being made by common law for supplying the wants or administering to the necessities of the widow and children immediately after the death of the head of the family.[91]

[§ 759] 2. Nature and Purpose. What is commonly known as the "widow's allowance" is usually an absolute provision to which a widow is entitled in her own right and which she may dispose of as she sees proper.[92] It is not intended to compensate the widow for any apparent injustice to which she may, in any case, be exposed by the statute rules of distribution, or by the will of her husband, but merely to furnish her and the children dependent upon her with a reasonable maintenance and support for a short period,[93] although the allowance itself does not depend upon whether

[a] The design of the statute (1) is to furnish the necessary sustenance for the household for one year from decedent's death, and to enable the widow to keep her domestic circle, as respects the remaining members, unbroken during that time, and the allowance of bedding, furniture, and provisions should be made upon this basis. Strawn v. Strawn, 53 Ill. 263. To same effect Vincent v. Vincent, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 333. (3) "We are of opinion that this provision is intended for the present relief of the widow, for the maintenance of herself and children; that it is temporary in its nature, and personal in its character, and confers no absolute or contingent right of property which can survive her, or go to her personal representative." "Such bounties allowed under the statute to the widow are no part of her dower proper, though they do in some respects resemble it, for she has an absolute property in them, and not a life estate. Bryant v. McCune, 49 Mo. 546; Glenn v. Gunn, 88 Mo. A. 423; Ellis v. Ellis, 119 Mo. A. 63, 96 SW 260. In this view essentially the Supreme Court receded from the fundamental proposition involved in Griffith v. Canning, 54 Mo. 282, as appears by the more recent case of State v. Taylor, 72 Mo. 656, though no reasoning is given, for in that case it is declared the widow of a childless husband is entitled to take such statutory allowances, and this, too, whether she elects to take her dower or the one-half of her deceased husband's estate under the statute heretofore referred to. It is to be noted of this case that the opinion was prepared by the same judge who wrote Griffth v. Canning; this, too, when that case alone was cited in the briefs in support of the contrary doctrine. The principles of the two adjudications reflect a fundamental variance which may not be reconciled, and it would have relieved us of much labor had the first decision been expressly overruled as it should have been, instead of by process sub silentio. Besides this authority, which entirely repels the idea that the widow by electing to take one-half of the estate postponed her claim to the statutory allowance to that of a distributee after the debts are paid, the more recent case of Waters v. Herbeth, 178 Mo. 166, 77 SW 305, declares the purpose of sections 115, 116, 117, Rev. St. 1909, is to give the articles mentioned and the rights thereto to the widow immediately, and that her right attaches at once upon the death of her husband. The court declares in that case that the articles and rights contemplated by those sections are to form no part of the estate either for the creditors or the distributees, and, furthermore, that the rights of the widow immediately dissever such articles from the corpus of the estate. It is said, too, those sections of the statute and the rights of the widow thereunder are not to be considered in any manner in connection with section 351, which confers upon her the right to one-half of the deceased husband's real and personal property subject to the payment of debts, provided he dies without children or other descendants. From these more recent decisions of the Supreme Court, it is obvious that the doctrine of Griffith v. Canning, supra, no longer obtains as the rule of decision in that tribunal, and, after putting that adjudication out of the way, it is entirely clear that the widow did not forego her right to the $400 allowance by the mere act of electing under the statutes to take one-half of her husband's estate in lieu of her dower in real estate as mentioned by the pointed reference to the several sections of the statute pertaining to dower in lands in sections 353 and 355, which confer the right and point out the method of declaring the election." Martin v. Jones, 155 Mo. A. 490, 496, 134 SW 1097.

[a] That property has been set apart as a homestead for the benefit of the wife and minor children does not defeat their right after the husband's death to the statutory year's support, even though for more than a year succeeding his death they may have lived on the homestead estate and derived a support from it. Bardwell v. Edwards, 117 Ga. 824, 45 SE 40.

[b] A surviving husband, (1) who was joint owner of the fee, was entitled not only to his one fourth of the rents, his share as joint owner, but also to one third of the other three fourths of the rent until dower was allotted or the land was sold. Hamilton v. Riney, 140 Ky. 476, 131 SW 287. (2) Under a statute providing that a widower shall, in addition to curtesy, be allowed to keep, as his absolute property, all of the property provided for a widow out of her husband's estate, a widower can take, regardless of the birth of issue. allowance is usually held to apply regardless of the testacy or intestacy of decedent[2] or the solvency or insolvency of the estate;[3] but if decedent left no estate or assets sufficient for providing the statutory allowance, no obligation rests upon the executor or administrator to furnish it.[4] Where, as is sometimes the case, certain specified articles are set aside as exempted for the widow, such articles are not to be treated as assets, and are not subject to distribution, nor can they be claimed from the widow by the personal representative of the decedent.[5]

[§ 760] 3. Necessitous Circumstances. It is sometimes considered that the allowance or exemptions granted by statute which take priority of debts due by the estate presuppose the surviving widow, children, or family to be in necessitous circumstances,[6] and an allowance may be refused where no good reason is shown for granting it.[7] But there is also authority for the view that the right is an absolute one, not dependent upon the widow being in necessitous circumstances,[8] and that the court's discretion extends only to the amount to be awarded, and an allowance may not be denied entirely.[9]

[§ 761] 4. What Law Governs. It has been considered that the widow's allowance is to be determined by the law of the domicile of decedent,[10] in force at his death;[11] but there is also authority for the view that, where the widow is an actual and bona fide resident of a state other than that of her husband's residence, the law of the state of the widow's residence governs,[12] and that the allowance provided by the statute of a state may be granted, out of property within the state, to the widow of a nonresident decedent.[13] However,

C. 600, 603, 57 SE 372, 11 LRANS 361 ("The fiction that the law of the domicil governs as to personalty applies only to the distribution of the surplus, and does not obtain as against debts, legacies, charges of administration, and taxes, and hence cannot prevail against the year's provision, which is superior to all these, when the wife is actually and bona fide residing here with her children at the time of her husband's death. The technical rule that her husband's domicil is her domicil is well settled, but the fiction of domicil does not, as we have seen, control as to realty, nor even as to personalty, except in the distribution of the surplus. The year's provision is not in the nature of such distribution, but a humane provision of urgency taking precedence of all other claims against the estate. From its very nature and purpose, it has nothing to do with the husband's domicil, but is for the support of the wife and children if residing here at his death. Dower is allotted to the widow according to the law here, and not according to the law of the husband's domicil. There is no reason why the year's provision should not also be allotted to the widow as allowed by our statute, if she is actually and bona fide resident here").
13. In re Stromberg, 119 Minn. 325, 328–329, 138 NW 428 ("Justice Mitchell, in the concurring opinion in Bejamin v. Laroche, 39 Minn. 334, 40 NW 156, in apt and terse language, expresses the true status of the personal property which the surviving spouse takes under our law: 'I concur, but would place the decision upon the ground that the right of a widow to the property allowed her by subdivision 1, § 1, chapter 51 [R. L. 1905, § 3653] is as absolutely vested the instant of the death of her husband as that to her distributive share of the balance of the estate, the only difference being that in the one case the property is subject to administration, and in the other not.' That this is now the law appears clearly from the opinion in Sammons v. Higbie, 103 Minn. 448, 115 NW 265, where Mr. Justice Brown says with reference to a

it has been considered that an allowance provided for by the statute of one state will not be enforced in equity in another state as an indebtedness, on a deficiency of personal assets, in the absence of a statute providing for such allowance.[14]

[§ 762] 5. Construction of Statutes. Although statutes providing for an allowance to the widow and children should be beneficially construed,[15] they cannot be extended beyond their obvious purpose,[16] and are generally presumed to be prospective and not retrospective.[17]

[§ 763] B. Homestead and Exemption Rights. The statutes sometimes set apart for the surviving wife, husband, or children, the homestead and the personal property which decedent held exempt from execution in his lifetime,[18] but such provisions are discussed elsewhere in their appropriate places in this work.[19]

[§ 764] C. Quarantine or Other Occupation or Use—1. Widow's Right in General. A widow's quarantine[20] is her right to enjoy the mansion house together with its farm or plantation, rent free, for a fixed time after her husband's death[21] or until dower is assigned her.[22] Actual possession widow's right under this statute: 'The clear intention of the legislature was to vest an absolute right to the property mentioned in the widow; the only act remaining to be done after the husband's death being the designation of the particular property selected by her. . . . It was clearly not the intention that the property so "allowed" should enter into the administration of the estate at all.' The fiction of law that the situs of the personal property of a nonresident decedent is in the state or country of his domicil is only for the purpose of distributing the residue of the estate, subject to the expenses of administration and the rights of creditors, in the state where the property is actually found. Property not subject to administration or distribution need have no situs by fiction of law to come into the possession of the true owner. No legislative intent to restrict the scope of the beneficiaries named in the first subdivision of said section 3653 to resident widows or widows of nonresident decedents is found in the language itself. It is all comprehensive. In view of the fact that enactments of similar import to said section are found so generally upon the statutes of sister states, it would seem that by comity we should extend to a widow who comes into the state where the only property of her deceased husband is found, the same right she would have had if both she and her deceased husband were domiciled here.' In the case note to Jones v. Layne, 144 N. C. 600, 57 SE 373, 11 LRANS 361, it is said: 'A state within whose borders personal assets of a decedent are found has the power to grant an exemption or allowance to the widow out of those assets, irrespective of the domicil of her husband at the time of his death. . . . Generally, however, the local statutes on the subject are not explicit with respect to the effect of the residence or domicil of the deceased in another state at the time of his death; and in such situation the well-established principle of private international law, that the distribution of the personal estate of a decedent is governed by the law of his domicil is allowed to control.' Even when such statutes are not explicit a restricted construction has not been given. Jones v. Layne, supra, and In re Gill, 79 Iowa 296, 44 NW 553, 9 LRA 126. In Kapp v. Public Admr., 2 Bradf. Surr. (N. Y.) 258, upon facts similar to those here involved and under a statute much like our own, the rights of the widow to certain personal property of her deceased husband were not limited by the fact of decedent's domicil in another state").

or affirmative assertion of such claim on her part is not essential, possession by her agent or tenant being sufficient;[23] and the widow is entitled to quarantine, whether she resided in the mansion house or elsewhere at the time of her husband's death.[24] The right of the widow is, however, effective only against those claiming under decedent and not against those claiming under a title adverse to him.[25] On termination of the right the heir is entitled to possession,[26] and where the period of occupation is fixed, trespass or ejectment may be maintained against the widow if she stays beyond the time allowed, although dower has not been assigned to her.[27]

[§ 765] 2. Nature of Right. The widow's right of quarantine is in addition to and independent of her allowance for support[28] and not in lieu of dower.[29] As a general rule the right is regarded, not as an estate in land, but as a mere personal privilege belonging to the widow,[30] which is not assignable[31] or subject to execution against her,[32] and which dies with her.[33] However, the right to quarantine has also been regarded as a possessory right which may be assigned so as to transfer to the assignee all the incidents of the right which belonged to the widow prior to the transfer;[34] and it has been held that before assignment of dower the widow has a freehold estate for life in the land of her husband unless it is sooner defeated by the heir,[35] and that the widow's right may be transferred to another.[36]

[§ 766] 3. Property Subject to Quarantine. In general the right extends only to houses and lands of which the widow is dowable,[37] and does not extend to mortgaged[38] or leased[39] premises. The right usually extends to the mansion house[40] in

[b] A probate homestead, as provided for by the California statute, extends to the dwelling house in which claimant resides and the land on which it is situated, with no specified limitation of value if the estate is not insolvent and hence the fact that premises suitable for probate homestead purposes are indivisible and constitute in value nearly one half the estate does not impair the homestead right. which decedent resided at the time of his death[41] and the curtilage appurtenant thereto.[42] It has been held, however, that the right of quarantine is not confined to contiguous lands, especially where the different parts have been used together and not as separate and independent holdings,[43] although the widow has no right to retain possession of a tract about two and one-half miles away.[44]

Property specifically devised may, it has been held, be set apart as a probate homestead for the family.[45]

[§ 767] 4. Right to Rents and Profits. The terms "mansion" and "messuages" in the statutes entitling a widow to quarantine therein include the rents and profits thereof during the period of occupancy[46] unless, where her right continues until dower is assigned, she is at fault in delaying such assignment.[47] This right is not affected by the fact that her possession of the house and land is detrimental to the best interests of the estate.[48] If the rent of the dwelling house and land which she is entitled to occupy has been received by the executor, administrator, or other person during the period allowed her, she may maintain an action at law against him for its recovery.[49] Under a statute providing that "the wife shall be entitled to one-third of the rents and profits of her husband's dowable real estate, from his death till dower is assigned," the widow is entitled to the gross rents during that time, without any deduction for taxes, insurance, or repairs.[50]

[§ 768] 5. Liabilities Incident to Occupancy. A widow in possession of quarantine property for a considerable period may be charged with her fair proportion of the cost of incidental repairs upon the dwelling house,[51] but not for the cost of perma-

[a] The word "curtilage," used in the statute relating to the allowance to a widow before dower is assigned, was borrowed from the English statutes, meaning the inclosed space surrounding a dwelling and contained within the same inclosure, the dwellings and outhouses of all kinds in England being generally surrounded by a fence inclosing a small piece of land embracing the yards and outbuildings near the house. Booker v. Jarrett, 72 W. Va. 606, 78 SE 754.

[b] A small storeroom within the yard inclosing the mansion house, once occupied by the husband with merchandise, but afterward used by him as a storageroom, the entire premises constituting part of his home farm, is part of the curtilage, to the possession of which his widow is entitled until dower assigned. Booker v. Jarrett, 72 W. Va. 606, 78 SE 754.

[c] A farm without buildings on it which adjoins and was used by the husband in connection with a farm belonging to the wife, upon which latter was a mansion house occupied by them both until the husband's death, cannot be included in the widow's quarantine. [d] The word "messuage" in a statute authorizing a widow to remain in possession of the mansion house and messuage of her deceased husband includes only lands adjoining the house to the extent of a few acres. [a] A growing crop (1) is included in the rents and profits. Blair v. Murthree, 81 Ala. 454, 2 S 18; Engle v. Engle, 3 W. Va. 246. (2) But the widow is not entitled to crops harvested before decedent's death, although not removed until afterward. Bush v. Bush, 41 Ind. A. 46, 83 NE 386.

[b] Fruits and products.—"A fair construction of this section means, we think, that the surviving wife and minor children shall not only occupy the messuage and adjacent fields, if any, not exceeding forty acres, but that they shall receive, use and enjoy the fruits and products of the same which naturally ripen, mature and come off during the year which they have the right to occupy the premises. To restrict the meaning of the section to the mere occupancy of the fields, without the use and enjoyment of its products, would be a 'barren ideality,' and would wholly frustrate the benefits and purposes contemplated in its enactment. The finding of the court in this case shows that the straw in controversy was the product of the field, which grew and matured during the year which the appellant had a right to occupy it and enjoy its fruits, and that the appellee had no right to it, and that he took it wrongfully, and converted it to his own use. The finding, therefore, shows that the appellant has a right to recover the value of the straw." Swain v. Bartlow, 62 Ind. 546, 548 [quot Jones v. Jones, 81 Ind. 292, 293].

(2) But a later statute fixed her right at one third of the rents and profits of all her husband's dowable real estate from his death until dower was assigned, without any deduction for taxes, insurance, or repairs. [a] Defenses.—It is no defense in a suit by the widow against the executor to recover the rent of the plantation between the time of the husband's death and the assignment of dower, that he paid the debts of the estate from the income of the plantation, leaving the entire personalty to be divided, of which the widow received her share, but he is entitled to credit for the share so received by her. nent repairs.[52] Prior to the assignment of dower she is not chargeable with rent for her occupancy,[53] nor may an action for use and occupation be maintained against her.[54] She is not chargeable with interest on mortgages on the quarantine property,[55] nor is her interest as dower or quarantine to be diminished by the taxes assessed either in her husband's lifetime or during her quarantine.[56]

[§ 769] 6. Enforcement or Defense of Right. The widow's right to the possession of the mansion house, messuage, and plantation may be enforced by an action of ejectment,[57] but not by an action of forcible entry and detainer.[58] The widow's neglect to apply for the assignment of dower is not a good defense against her assertion of her right of quarantine.[59] Until the period of her occupancy has expired she may successfully defend an action of ejectment against her,[60] but an answer in ejectment claiming the right to hold the land under a right of dower, but alleging that dower had not been assigned and failing to allege anything as to the premises being the mansion or farm attached thereto, is fatally defective.[61]

[§ 770] 7. Forfeiture of Right. The widow's right of quarantine may be forfeited by her removal from or abandonment of the premises,[62] and it has been held that a widow who occupies a portion of decedent's premises with the family and rents the remainder is not entitled to the whole under the right of quarantine.[63] The widow's right is not lost by her remarriage [64] or insanity,[65] nor is it affected by the removal of the children.[66]

[§ 771] D. Maintenance and Support—1. Liability of Estate in General. Under various statutes the property of decedent may be used or expended, pending administration, for the necessary maintenance of his widow and young children, for a limited period, and to a reasonable amount, regardless of the solvency of the estate,[67] and according to some authorities, even though the widow may

[e] If the property exempt from execution is insufficient to support the widow for a year, a monthly allowance may be ordered to her. In re Dekum, 28 Or. 97, 41 P 159.

[f] An allowance in lieu of provisions to which a widow is entitled under the statute is an appropriation to cover only a deficiency in grain, meat, vegetables, groceries, and other provisions, and should not include compensation for the lack of any other articles allowed her as her absolute property. See v. See, 66 Mo. A. 566.

[g] A husband is entitled to an allowance for provisions which were not on hand. Nelson v. Troll, 173 Mo. A. 51, 156 SW 16.

[h] Where an estate is kept together under an order of the probate court, according to the statute, the administrator has no authority to keep up the family establishment and to support the family at the expense of the estate, but the reasonable expenses of the several members of the family should be charged against each separately. Hinson v. Williamson, 74 Ala. 180; Pickens v. Pickens, 35 Ala. 442.

[j] Expenses of sickness in family.—Expenses preliminary and incidental to the confinement of an insane adult daughter may be paid by the widow out of the estate. Matter of Morris, 11 NYS 201, 2 Conn. Surr. 372.

[k] When allowance properly refused.—It is within the county clerk's discretion not to allow a widow anything for support where during ad-have an income of her own, or be financially able to support herself without any aid from the estate.[68] A fortiori such allowance should not be denied to a widow who has obtained relief by borrowing money or through charity and afterward applies for an allowance.[69] It has been held, however, that the total advance to a widow for her support during a contest of her husband's will should be deducted from her share as next of kin, if the will is broken, or from her interest under the will, if it is sustained.[70]

[§ 772] 2. Estate of Mother. In the absence of testamentary provision therefor,[71] the minor children of a deceased mother are not as a general rule entitled to maintenance and support out of her estate,[72] although this is sometimes allowed by statute,[73] especially where the father of the children predeceased their mother.[74]

[§ 773] 3. Period of Allowance. A year's support is usually the extreme statutory limit,[75] especially where the estate is insolvent,[76] and under some statutes the period specified is considerably less.[77] Where the statute provides for an allowance to the widow "during the progress of the settlement of the estate," the widow can claim the allowance for such length of time only as is reasonably necessary to settle the estate.[78] Under a statute providing that certain specified articles shall remain in the possession of the widow during the time she lives with and provides for such minor child or children as there may be, the widow has been held entitled to such articles so long as she is able and willing to keep up the family circle and provide for minor children, although the minor children leave her without her fault.[79]

[§ 774] 4. Maintenance Prior to Allowance. If the representative makes any advance to the widow or children before a decree of allowance, he does so at his own risk, as an advance upon such allowance as may be afterward made by the probate court,[80] but the courts generally pursue a liberal course both in permitting expenditures in advance of judicial allowance and in allowing a reasonable credit therefor to the executor or administrator in his probate accounts.[81]

"The allowance to a widow for a year's support is not a mere charity, to be withheld because she has property of her own by which she could possibly keep herself and children during the first year of her widowhood. The statute, it is true, says the allowance shall be made if 'necessary' . . . but this language should have not only a reasonable, but liberal, construction to promote the purpose of its enactment. In the ordinary estate, even when of considerable value, the wife and young children of a deceased husband have during the first year special need of the assistance which this statute contemplates. If there is real estate, the title passes at once to the heirs or devisees in common, and considerable time is required before the fractional shares coming to these helpless members of the family can be made available as a means of support. If there be money or other personal estate, it passes to the administrator, who may not rightfully distribute any part of it until the court directs. If the minor children have any property in their own right, it also is subject to like delay in being reduced to available form or made productive of income. Moreover, the mother should not be required or allowed to trench upon the infant's property, and particularly the principal fund, except in clear cases of necessity, and time is required for interest and rents to be earned." Busby v. Busby, supra.
